THE WAR IN THE EAST: WITH THE RUSSIANS ACROSS THE DANUBE—THE FIRST DAY AT MATCHIN

Topics of the Week

THE ENGLISH FLEET AT BESIKA BAY.——A profound sensation was created this week by the order that the fleet should once more proceed to Besika Bay. The Government has hitherto so carefully confined itself to a policy of watchfulness that a large number of people seem to have made up their minds that it would never advance to a policy of action. Yet if it is of importance to us that Constantinople should not fall into the hands of Russia, England clearly could not stand aside, and simply do nothing. For, however bravely the Turks may resist the invaders, it is certain that they must in the end be overpowered. Russia has doubtless solemnly pledged herself not to take possession of the Turkish capital, but events might be too strong for the Czar. The popular cry for Constantinople might become so vehement that he would be unable to resist it. The supreme question for England, therefore, is, Do we mean to keep the Russians out of Constantinople? Or is there no sufficient reason why we should fight for it? That this question would be answered in accordance with the traditional policy of England, if we did not shrink from allying ourselves with the Turks, there can be little doubt. Nothing made Constantinople valuable to us twenty years ago which does not make it valuable to us now. The sole difficulty is that the Turks have so abused their opportunities that we resent the idea of even appearing to fight on their behalf. After all, however, as has been pointed out scores of times, we should not really be fighting for them, but for ourselves. In defending Constantinople we should be defending the Indian Empire, and, with the Indian Empire, the whole cause of civilisation in the East. We believe, therefore, that the Government have acted wisely in sending the fleet to Besika Bay. The Russians thus receive due warning that we are prepared in case of need to maintain what we believe to be our rights; and they may be induced to moderate their ambition, whatever may be their success in the field. Mr. Gladstone appears to have convinced himself that England would under no circumstances interfere; but the instant Constantinople is in danger he will find that he is mistaken. All classes of Englishmen detest Ottoman tyranny, but no important class would consent to see it replaced by the despotism of Russia.

PROGRESS OF THE WAR.——The accounts from the seat of war both in Europe and Asia are, as is usually the case, of a somewhat conflicting character. The official reports of the respective combatants are rarely trustworthy. If the Turks invent imaginary victories, the Russians conceal or slur over reverses. Nor is the news from the special correspondents of neutral nationalities altogether to be depended on. These gentlemen, however active and energetic they may be, cannot be everywhere at once, and much of the intelligence which they send home is derived from hearsay reports coloured by the views and wishes of the army with which they are serving, and modified to meet military exigencies. Neither of the combatants can be blamed for this, as, whatever their object may be in fighting, it is certainly not for the sake of providing sensational pabulum for English newspaper readers. Meanwhile the war, as it is gradually developed, proves a weightier business than many of us expected. Both Russ-lovers and Turk-lovers, drawing erroneous inferences from the rapidly-decided campaigns of late years, imagined that the Turks would be speedily brought to their knees. These expectations have hitherto been falsified. In Armenia the Russian army, which at first seemed to carry all before it, has met with serious reverses, insomuch that the siege of Kars is likely to be abandoned. In Europe the crossing of the Danube by the invaders has not been met with the determined opposition which a more energetic people would have shown; but, even as it is, the transfer of the army to the Turkish shore is a slow process, and much remains to be done before the Balkans are reached. The faint resistance on the Danube is probably due to Turkish remissness; but it may also be due to an impression that the enemy can be more satisfactorily dealt with when a considerable space intervenes between his army and his base of operations.

THE FRENCH MINISTRY AND FRANCE.——There is a cynical audacity about the Circular addressed by the French Minister of the Interior to the Prefects which probably no other Minister in any of the advanced European nations could have equalled. He does not even pretend that the forthcoming elections are to be free. The Prefects are to "take care to direct public opinion well;" they are to "enlighten the electors;" they are to "put universal suffrage on its guard against the snares to which it is constantly exposed." All the world knows what this means. It means that the Prefects must miss no opportunity of influencing voters, and that if they adopt questionable methods of doing so the Government will interpret their rights in a very large sense. That they may feel no scruples they are reminded that "functionaries of every kind are knit to the Government which has appointed them by ties which they are bound not to forget." On this ground M. de Fourtou feels sure that the action of the Prefects "cannot be hampered by those who in any degree represent the Government." It would be very foolish to suppose that all this will have no effect. The respect of the French peasant for the Prefect and the Mayor is intense; and a policy of direct and indirect intimidation by means of these officials may have a powerful influence on the more ignorant class of voters. On the whole, however, it seems certain that intelligent France and the Ministry are absolutely opposed to each other. The former cannot understand what are the fearful perils to which the latter so persistently point. No one talks of breaking the law except the Bonapartists; the Republicans earnestly uphold existing institutions, and desire only that they shall be worked in an impartial spirit. Frenchmen, therefore, naturally ask, against what dangers are they to be protected by the Government? M. Gambetta's followers have hitherto refrained from all action that would give their enemies a pretext for violence; and it may be hoped that even the Irreconcileables will now be induced to remain calm until the decision of the nation is known. If they do so, and France nevertheless returns a Chamber pledged to support the Duc de Broglie, the friends of liberty will have good reason to feel that they have a dark prospect before them. On the other hand, a Parliament more Republican than that which has just been dissolved would be the best possible proof that at last France is competent to govern herself, and does not mean to be any longer misled by selfish and narrow-minded partisans. The whole of Liberal Europe wishes that the latter may be the result of the wretched intrigue which has thus far been conducted with so much insolence and unscrupulousness.

VACCINATION.——Lawyers and railway directors abound in the House of Commons, but medical members are few in number. The chief reason, perhaps, for this paucity of doctors in Parliament is the absorbing character of their occupation. Their working hours are passed at the bedside or in the consulting-room, and the persons with whom they are brought in contact are far too much interested in their own disordered bodies to care about politics. Besides, the busiest lawyer or merchant has his evenings free, whereas a doctor's work is never done, and, if he continues to practise while in Parliament, his legislatorial labours would always be liable to interruption by the claims of his patients. We are led to make these observations because during the discussion of Earl Percy's motion on Vaccination only one medical man spoke, and yet this is just a subject where professional opinion is of the highest importance. The thinness of the House was no doubt in some measure due to the daring raid made by the Home Rulers early that morning on honourable members' repose; still it must be confessed that questions affecting the public health are rarely discussed in the House of Commons with much liveliness or much capacity. As for the question of Vaccination, little if any new light was thrown upon it, and the general opinion seemed to coincide very fairly with that of the outside public, namely, that while there are risks attached to vaccination, which may in some measure excuse the prejudices of the anti-vaccinators, these risks are so small compared with the peril incurred by those who are unprotected by vaccination, that the application of Jenner's great discovery must be rigorously enforced. We cannot approve of the suggestion that cumulative fines should be abolished—that a non-vaccinator should be once fined and then let go scot-free. Rich men, and poor men aided by anti-Jenner clubs (several of which are in existence) would, if the law were thus altered, enjoy the luxury of disobedience at the price of a fine, while the small-pox plague would be spread by the unarmoured children of these fanatics. Nor would the American plan of refusing unvaccinated children admission to school be of much advantage, as prejudiced parents would then be tempted to defer the ceremony till the school-age was reached.

PARLIAMENT AND THE PUBLIC.——It is a disagreeable fact that Parliament is not rising in the esteem of the public. At one time statesmen reserved for it all important announcements; but now a man like Mr. Gladstone prefers to expound his ideas to a number of Baptist ministers. Such a shock to its dignity as this it would recover, but it will find it hard to do away with the impression caused by the disgraceful scenes of last Tuesday morning. That half-a-dozen members should have been able to keep the House of Commons at work until seven in the morning, and to force it to go through seventeen divisions during the night, is enough to bring Parliamentary institutions into utter contempt. It is hardly worth while to argue with the fanatics who were so reckless of the fair fame of the House to which they belong. Their aim is to compel the country to grant from a sense of disgust what no amount of argument will ever induce it to concede. Hence they probably take their ridiculous tactics for a proof of the loftiest patriotism. The House of Commons itself, however, is to blame for not having long ago deprived them of the weapon they have so shamefully used. By all means let private members have as much liberty as is compatible with the proper dispatch of public business; but their freedom ought obviously to be limited by a strict regard to the welfare of the community. With their present powers a few wild enthusiasts may simply thwart every attempt at serious legislation. It is to be hoped, therefore, that no time will be lost in so modifying the existing arrangements as to render impossible a repetition of the now famous morning sitting. The nation will gladly exchange some of the endless talk with which it is now bored for a little real work.

DE TOURVILLE, OTHERWISE PERREAU.——In this country any legal proceedings which happen to attract public curiosity are apt to be spun out to an extraordinary length, and so we may congratulate the Austrian authorities on having, when they once made up their minds to undertake the task, decided the question of M. de Tourville's guilt or innocence with such comparative rapidity. This is the more remarkable because to the strict mind of a British-bred lawyer their method of procedure seems both lax and amateurish. All the known incidents in the prisoner's past life, whether relevant or irrelevant to the charge before the Court, are set forth in the preliminary act of accusation, and both this and a vast amount of hearsay evidence is purposely permitted to influence the minds of the jury. It is possible that altogether justice is substantially done under both the English and the Continental systems, and that each is suited to the people among whom it exists. Innocence occasionally, though rarely, suffers on the Continent; while in England a good many rogues, whose moral obliquity is plain both to judge and jury, are set free on technical grounds. But it is worth observing that the facts which transpired at the outset in connection with Madame de Tourville's death, and which by Englishmen would have been regarded as highly suspicious, did not seem to the Austrian authorities of sufficient importance to justify her husband's detention. It was not until they had raked up various damaging antecedents in M. de Tourville's previous career that they began to suspect that the fascinating ex-notary's clerk of Valenciennes might possibly be a murderer. Altogether, Continental justice seems of a more feminine type than our own. Lastly, this case shows that gradually, for all practical purposes, Europe is becoming one homogeneous State. In this case a man, who was by birth a Frenchman but by naturalisation an Englishman, killed his wife in Austria, was arrested in England, extradited to Austria, and there convicted of the crime. Much less than a hundred years ago such a cosmopolitan story would have been impossible.

PAUPERISM AND THE REVENUE.——The satisfaction caused by the prosperous condition of the Revenue has been somewhat damped by the fact that pauperism has in the latest return ceased to show signs of decrease. Of late years we have become accustomed to hearing at stated intervals that there were fewer paupers than at the same season twelve months before; and many hoped that a time was speedily coming when the evil would be brought within very narrow limits. Already, however, we have reached a point at which a decline is no longer mentioned. The reason probably is that the decrease has been mainly due to the more rigorous application of the workhouse test. In the good old days, when it was thought that charity could not be too lavish, it was comparatively easy for an idle scoundrel to obtain help from the public purse. Since political economists have taught us that it is no kindness to the poor themselves to be indiscriminately generous, applications for help have been more rigorously examined. And the result has been that thousands who were once relieved have been compelled to depend on their own exertions. But all who seek for public aid are not indolent impostors. A considerable proportion are really unable to provide for themselves. It would seem that relieving officers have now managed to get rid of most of the undeserving, and find themselves confronted by a class who cannot be dismissed without harshness. If this theory is correct, we need not look for any further diminution for a considerable time to come. The number of those who are absolutely obliged to beg for assistance is very slowly lessened by the increasing prosperity of the nation. The chances are that in the immediate future the burden of pauperism will become rather heavier than it has been during the last few years.

PERILS OF RAILWAY PLATFORMS.——The other day at Camden Town Station a passenger, hurrying to get on board of a train which had already started, jostled against a little girl, and sent her flying under the engine. Strange to say, although all the carriages went over the little girl, she escaped unhurt, but she owes no thanks to the reckless passenger. With all our alleged phlegm, we Britishers are, to judge from our behaviour at railway stations, the most nervous, impatient beings alive. It is quite a sight to watch the arrival of one of the early suburban trains. Nearly every male creature, who is not a cripple, or over seventy-five years of age, is out on the platform while the train is still going at the rate of a swiftish omnibus. Similarly, when homeward-bound in the evening, seven impetuous gentlemen simultaneously seize the handle of each compartment some seconds before the train stops. Nobody likes to be outdone in the race of agility, and the company's guards set the brightest example of all, for they swing into their lonely little cells with the alertness of acrobats. As the company never summons anybody unless the said body is so clumsy as to tumble down and hurt himself, this high-pressure method of doing business is extremely jolly for the stalwart and active, but unfortunately there are apt to be old folks, or women and children, "foolin' round," as the Americans phrase it, and they sometimes come to grief. This is especially the case where the platforms are very narrow, with a train on either side,—as is the case on a certain much-patronised line within a hundred miles of Waterloo Bridge,—and where, when the porters come tearing along trundling a mountain of toppling portmanteaus, and bellowing "By your leave!" the timid passenger feels as a startled Russian gunner might have felt when Lord Cardigan and the Six Hundred thundered along the Balaklava Valley.

Our Illustrations

THE WAR IN THE EAST

CROSSING THE DANUBE

As the majority of our sketches mainly refer to one event, namely, the crossing of the Danube by the Russians on the 21st ult., and their subsequent entry into Matchin, it is scarcely needful to give a lengthened description of each sketch, and in many cases the titles alone sufficiently explain their purport. To take our sketches chronologically, the engraving of "Towing the Rafts into Position" represents the formation of the bridge by which the Russians crossed into the Drobrudscha, and which, as completed, is shown on another page. We illustrated and fully described last week the construction of these rafts, each of which, as soon as completed, was towed to its position at the end of the line of its fellows, where it was duly lashed and secured until the time arrived for swinging the bridge across the river. Our sketch was taken on the day the Russians crossed, and represents a raft loaded with men and huge wooden horses or trestles approaching the Matchin bank.

Ibraila, whence the Russians crossed into Turkey, has frequently played an important part in Turko-Russian campaigns, and notably in 1828, when it was captured by the Russians from the Turks—after a courageous defence during which a fleet of thirty-two Turkish gunboats was utterly routed by a squadron of eighteen Russian vessels. In the present campaign it was early occupied by the Russians, who at once turned the natural advantages of the place to account—for the banks of the river here are elevated and precipitous—by erecting strong batteries destined to protect the troops during their crossing. In peaceful times Ibraila is a busy, thriving town, and its quays teem with shipping, but just now there is no thought of commerce, and troops have replaced the ordinary peaceful army of merchants.

From the heights of Ibraila a good view is obtained of the Dobrudscha and the little town of Matchin, and of this our artist has taken advantage to send a couple of sketches of especial interest in connection with the crossing of the Russians and their subsequent operations. They were taken from the roof of the English Consulate, and are admirably described by the Daily News correspondent, who accompanied our artist, and from whose letter the following description is extracted:—"Nearly opposite Ibraila ends a large island, which, commencing at Hirsova, some sixty miles higher up, divides the Danube into two channels, which run almost parallel to each other—the right branch, or Turkish, on which Matchin stands, being called the 'Old Danube,' and the left, the 'Danube Proper.'

"The island formed by these branches belongs to Roumania; it is low, flat, and intersected with watercourses. At this season quite one-half of it is swamp. The tail of it here opposite us, as we look out from the roof of the Consul's house, is partly bare, partly covered with low scrubby wood, alders, and willows. The Old Danube beyond these alders and willows trends away sharply to the southward, almost but not quite at right angles to the main branch which lies at our feet between us and the island. Follow with the eye the course of the Old Danube. About half-way up between the bifurcation and Matchin notice that tall bare spar rising in its nakedness high above the foliage. That is the still standing mizenmast of the ill-fated Lufti Jelel, the Turkish corvette. The tragic story of her fate has been already told. In the hospital under the Red Cross flag there lies, torn and mangled, the sole survivor of the two hundred men who formed her crew. Some distance higher up are visible more spars above the trees; but these are not so lofty as the mournful relic of the corvette. Here, under what shelter the island bank may afford, lie three Turkish gunboats; there is not sufficient water for them, it appears, to emerge from the Old Danube branch upward. Looking a little to the right of the topmasts of the gunboats, we trace the outlines of the principal buildings of Matchin. The distance is eight miles, so that even with the glass not a great deal is to be made out, save that in a slope near the centre stands a mosque, with an imposing front, flanked by two minarets. Matchin is fortified after a fashion—that is, the old walls, and peppercorn flanking turrets, and crenellated curtains have not wholly crumbled into the moat; but it has no pretensions to be a place of strength in the modern acceptation of the term. There are a few batteries about it which were armed with large but obsolete small-bore cannon. Matchin slopes up on the hill-side, and is very pretty from the distance at which we look on it, while the sun is dancing on the housetops and lighting up the sombreness of the woods on the ridge behind it, growing gradually paler till it fades away into a faint blue, that ridge recedes in a south-westerly direction towards Hirsova, sixty miles off at the head of the great island."

THE FEVER LAND OF THE DOBRUDSCHA

THIS famous tract of land, which has so frequently served as a battle-field between Russians and Turks, and which from Toultscha almost to the Wall of Trajan is now in the hands of the Russians, is in all about 7,000 square miles in extent, and mainly consists of an undulating treeless prairie like the tract depicted in the foreground of our sketch—excepting in a few districts where a range of hills occur such as the Baba Dagh, in which Toultscha and Matchin are situated. Owing to the extreme flatness of the ground there are various inlets from the river, which overflows in the spring, and then retreating leaves inland lakes and large marshy districts. Not a tree or shrub is to be seen for miles, and the only villages are those built by German colonists, while the towns, such as Matchin and Toultscha, are in a half-ruined condition. There are no streams and water-courses, and the inhabitants often have to dig deeply for their wells. Some of the lakes near the sea are brackish, while others afford a livelihood to fair-haired Cossack fishermen, who, a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette recently stated, "have here followed their hereditary occupation since the days of the conquest of the Ukraine." The same writer roundly contradicts the "hallucination" that the "Dobrudscha is only another word for all that is fatal or pernicious to health." The loss by General Espinasse of a large portion of his force at Mangalia and Kustendjie during the Crimean War has been so often attributed to the "pestilential malaria of those fatal swamps" that the fact that it was due to cholera, which was then raging with equal violence in the English fleet off Baltjik, has been quite overlooked. The writer declares that the Dobrudscha is ordinarily as healthy as the Wiltshire downs, so that from his account the Russian troops will probably benefit from the change of air rather than be decimated by malaria as so many prophets have foretold. To return to our sketch, the hills on the right are manifestly those where a severe engagement ensued after the crossing, after which the Turks were forced to retire upon Hirsova.

ACROSS THE DANUBE

THE Russians entered Matchin on the 23rd inst., the Turks having evacuated the town without striking a blow. The Russian troops under gallant General Zimmermann met with a hearty welcome from the Christian residents of the town, who in a procession headed by their priests met them on the outskirts with banners and holy pictures, and presented their "deliverers" with friendly offerings of bread, salt, and a Bible, meanwhile singing songs in praise of the Russians. Each priest held in his hand a small wooden cross. The Russian general and officers took off their caps and kissed the crosses, while the priests sprinkled them with holy water, and the people cheered. Having once effected a crossing the Russians poured over bodies of troops, and Cossacks in particular. Of these one of our illustrations depicts an outpost now stationed on the Turkish bank of the Danube, while two other sketches, "Fresh Water by the Way" and "A Halt for Tea," depict incidents during the march of the Russian troops in the Dobrudscha, which manifest the kindly feeling of the Christian inhabitants towards the invaders.—Our sketches of the interior of Matchin are self-explanatory.

IN ROUMANIA

"TELEGRAPH Wires at Plojesti" and a "Roumanian Railway Guard" are self-explanatory titles, and "A Spy! A Spy!" represents a disagreeable incident which befel our artist at Galatz, but which, thanks to a timely explanation, had no serious result. The "spy fever" is raging rather hotly just now in Roumania, and even diplomatic agents are charged with exercising a greater curiosity regarding military operations, and less reticence as to divulging any knowledge they may have obtained than is agreeable to Russian official circles. The sketch of the Bashi-Bazouks represents one of those frequent raids upon "women and sheep," in which these troops are wont to indulge. It is against these marauders that the Cossack outposts are mainly utilised.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF GIURGEVO

WHEN the Russians began their terrible bombardment of Rustchuk, which has laid the town in ruins, the Turks speedily replied with a cannonade almost as destructive upon the opposite town, Giurgevo, which, according to the Daily News correspondent, has certainly had a "bad time of it." All the prominent buildings have suffered, including the German and Dutch Consulates and the Hotel d'Europe. The inhabitants have accordingly been wont to leave the town during the day, while many have camped out altogether in the environs, where restaurants and stalls for all species of edibles have been improvised. One of the chief reasons for the bombardment of Rustchuk by the Russians was to draw the attention of the Turks off Simnitcha, and thus be enabled the more easily to effect their second crossing.

THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH OF ROUMANIA

THIS lady, whose full name is Pauline Elizabeth Ottilie Louise, is the daughter of the late Prince Hermann of Wied, and was born in 1843. In 1869 she was married to Prince Charles, three years after his accession to the throne. The Princess is deservedly popular with the Roumanians, for she spares no pains to ingratiate herself with her husband's subjects, and always makes it a rule on the fête day of the country (the Moschi or "fête of ancestors") when great festival is held at Bucharest, to appear together with the ladies of her Court in the national peasant's costume of Roumania. It is in this dress that she is represented in our engraving, which is from a photograph by F. Duschek, of Bucharest. Nor does her sympathy with the people extend only to adopting their outward attire, as on the last fête day she descended from her carriage, and actually joined

THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL

THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL NICHOLAIEVITCH, the third younger brother of the Czar, is the Governor-General of the Caucasus, and since the outbreak of war has commanded the Russian forces in Asia. His chief personal efforts in the present campaign have been as yet mainly directed to the reduction of the famed fortress of Kars, which he has been besieging with great energy, but as far as is at present known without any definite success. He is in his forty-fifth year, having been born in October, 1832, and in 1857 married the Grand Duchess Olga Feodorovna (née Cecile Augusta), daughter of the late Grand Duke Leopold of Baden-Baden.

DEPARTURE OF THE EGYPTIAN SQUADRON FOR ALEXANDRIA

THIS sketch represents the Egyptian contingent of 7,100 men under the command of Prince Hassan leaving Alexandria for the Turkish army. Their departure was delayed for some time on account of the non-arrival of the ironclad squadron which was to protect them from the Russian cruisers; but on June 15 four men-of-war having arrived, the transports were enabled to set sail. "The departure was a fine sight," writes the correspondent of The Times. "The Ottoman escort lay outside the harbour with steam up—four huge men-of-war quite able and ready to sink all the audacious Russian cruisers that are said to be prowling about these waters in hopes of capturing the Egyptian fleet. The transports, preceded by a gunboat, went out in the following order:—Behara, Fayoum, Charkieh, Rahmanieh, Dahalieh, Garbieh, Tanta, each named after an Egyptian province. Then followed the frigate Mehemet Ali, which in these days is 'as much good as a card-board box;' at least so said an old navy officer. The Masr (the Arabic name for Cairo) brought up the rear, with the Prince Hassan, the Commander-in-Chief, and his staff on board. The shipping in the harbour was dressed, and all the ports saluted the ships as they passed out to sea. The Arabs seemed proud of the sight, and talked of certain victory in the war. 'Things have changed,' said one, 'since the great war (the Crimean War); we no longer need the aid of the Queen of England. Look at our paved streets, our square, our gas, our progress! Allah must make us wise.' 'But why,' asked another, 'did Allah make all these men? Not to kill each other. There is something wrong in it all.'"

THE ARTILLERY MAGAZINE, TOPHANEH, CONSTANTINOPLE

THE Artillery Magazine, Tophaneh, is one of the chief depôts of military stores in the Turkish capital, and it is here that the "Council of Tophaneh" sits, under the presidency of the chief of artillery, and furnishes and controls the matériel of war and all military and manufacturing establishments. As the name implies (top cannon, haneh manufactory) the establishment is also a foundry, where cannon and shells are cast, the copper for the latter being mostly furnished from the mines in Asia Minor. Here also in a large square are stored numberless cannon and their limber in readiness for service. The magazine is situated in the little Turkish quarter at the junction of the Golden Horn and the Bosphorus, between the busy Frank quarter of Galata and the Sultan's marble palace at Dolma Bagtché.

PALACE OF THE GRAND DUKE, CITADEL AT TIFLIS, ROCK CUT ROOM, AND DARIEL

THE "dvorets," or palace, the residence of His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael-Nicolaievitch, at Tiflis, was built by the Russian Government as a residence for the Emperor's lieutenants in the Caucasus; and here have resided the Princes Woronzoff and Bariatinsky, whose administration won for them so much esteem in the country. Formerly the Governor's residence was the scene of much gaiety; the lieutenants of the Emperor gave many soirées and balls, and the Georgian ladies wasted small fortunes in toilettes. In those days it was that Hervien, Blot, and Tollet, the French milliners, waxed rich, and that the Armenians pocketed the wealth of their former rulers. Since the arrival of the Grand Duke the Palace has become a quiet home for the family of His Highness.

The Grand Duke is very courteous to English and American travellers, and very simple mortals who have left their cards at the palace have been surprised at receiving an invitation to dinner. His Highness and the Grand Duchess Olga-Feodorovna (née Duchess of Baden) both speak English readily.

The principal promenade of the elegants of Tiflis is on the Galavinsky Prospect, beginning in front of the palace at the drawing room window, at which, opposite the Museum, the Grand Ducal family may be seen every day from one to two o'clock looking at the passers-by. Court balls are rare occurrences at Tiflis now, invitations to dine having superseded those to dances at the palace. The garden of the Imperial Governor is the only fine one in the town.

The citadel of Tiflis is of a very imposing aspect, but is not used as a fortress, though having all the appearance of a stronghold. It is used as a barracks and arsenal. It commands the Persian quarter of Tiflis called Avlabar or Isni. In the picture may be seen beyond the citadel the ruins of the ancient Georgian fortress of T'pilici-Kalaki (town of T'pilici, or warm town, t'pili meaning warm). On the other side of the fortress beneath the hill is the only pretty spot in Tiflis, the so-called Botanical Garden. The view from the fortress of the town, with the Kura flowing through the valley, and the Kazbek in the distance, is very fine. The peaceful appearance of Tiflis has not been altered by the vicinity of the war. Ambulances and waggons with supplies, troops defiling, or prisoners escorted by a few Russian soldiers, pass through quietly, and business goes on, and people frequent the Alexander Sad (garden) and Mustajid as usual. The picture of the rock-cut room in Armenia will give an idea of the artificial caverns in the rocks which, both in Georgia and Armenia, excite the traveller's wonder. Sometimes there are steps cut in the rock giving access to these chambers, formerly all inhabited, now mostly deserted; but oftentimes there appears to be no means of communication with the caverns and the rock above. At Gori, near Koutais, at Achalzich, and near Erzeroum, there are numbers of these abandoned refuges of the past. On our way here we passed through the Defile or Pass of Dariel. This military station is considered important, as the old fortress commands the highway and, it is considered, could hold it against a considerable force.

GIBRALTAR—FROM THE "QUEEN OF SPAIN'S CHAIR"

THIS view of Gibraltar is taken from the top of the hill commonly known as the "Queen of Spain's Chair," about four miles from "the Rock." In the foreground is a waste of sandhills and the Spanish village of Linea, or "the Lines," which forms the Spanish boundary. Beyond is the neutral ground, many times a battle-field; then the English lines, along which our sentries are posted; and inside this the piece of ground known as the "North Front," whereon is the cemetery, racecourse, kennels of the Calpe Hunt, and the hut barracks, &c., the chief exercising ground of the Rock. Here take place the field days, races, &c. Sheer from this rises the "North Front" of the Rock, a height of 1,335 feet, and in this rocky front are hewn the celebrated "galleries" and the well-known battery termed "St. George's Hall," hewn out of the solid rock. More than half-way up, at the top, is the "Rock Gun," which was several times dismounted by the Spanish guns during the great siege. The old Moorish walls and castle which formerly protected the town on this side are well seen, as also the city itself, which lies at the foot of the slope. Beyond are the Straits, Ceuta on the left, and the mountain rising in the middle known as "Apes' Hill," the other Pillar of Hercules. The monkeys, which still frequent the Rock, are said to have come from here. Beyond these, again, lie heaped huge spurs of the Atlas Mountains, usually capped with snow and half-hid in clouds. Down the African coast to the right lies Tangier. It is said that the then Queen of Spain, at the taking of Gibraltar by the English, took up her station in the tower at the summit of the hill (shown in the picture), and vowed she would never leave it until the Rock was retaken; hence the name. When the enterprise was abandoned as hopeless, they raised a large black cross of wood, which stands there to this day.—Our engraving is from a sketch by Lieutenant Randolph, 69th (South Lincolnshire) Regiment.

THE RUMOURED VOTE OF CREDIT.——Mr. Gladstone, in a letter acknowledging an address from the Baptist Churches of Worcestershire, refers to the rumours that the Government were about to apply to Parliament for a vote of credit with a view to increased military preparations; and says that though he is far from asserting their truth, and trusts that they may prove unfounded, their character as a whole has been such that, if they need not be actually believed, they cannot safely be disregarded and dismissed from view. He denies that the vote taken by the late Administration after the outbreak of the Franco-German war can fairly be considered as a precedent for such a demand, and says that he is prepared to show in detail that in no material point do the two cases correspond.

A LIBERAL COMMITTEE FOR LONDON.——Mr. James Beal, who in 1865 acted as hon. secretary to the late John Stuart Mill's Westminster Election Committee, has written a letter to the Echo suggesting the organisation of a Liberal Committee (2,000 strong) for the whole metropolis. The planks of the political platform which he proposes are—"Assimilation of Borough and County Franchise, with re-distribution of seats; Religious Equality; a good Land Bill; Reform of the City Guilds and the City Corporation; and the Unity of London Government. (The three last points would mean, says Mr. Beal, a saving of 2,000,000*l.* a year in the administration of local government.) Mr. Beal thinks that all the candidates run by this Committee should be returned free of expense, and he modestly asks for "a large subscription" and "2,000 earnest men" to assist him in relieving London, outside the aldermanic area, "from the corruption of Guildhall."

MINOR POLITICAL MATTERS.——At the annual banquet of the National Union of Conservative Associations at Portsmouth on Saturday, the Solicitor-General, in responding for "Her Majesty's Ministers," said that it was one of the leading principles of their foreign policy to do right and observe justice. The distinguishing feature of English diplomatists above all others was that when they spoke or wrote they were known to mean what they said.—The Huntingdonshire election has resulted in favour of Lord Mandeville (C), who polled 1,468, being fifty-eight more than his opponent, the Hon. H. Fitzwilliam.—The electors of Stoke-upon-Trent are apparently getting tired of Dr. Kenealy. At all events the Liberal Council have ignored his claims, and decided to support Messrs. Melly and Woodall when the next contest takes place.—Mr. Bradlaugh's supporters at Northampton have expressed their determination to use their utmost endeavours to secure his return to Parliament at the first opportunity.

THE CAXTON MEMORIAL EXHIBITION at South Kensington was opened on Saturday last in the presence of a large and fashionable company. Mr. Gladstone was met at the entrance by Sir C. Reed and the rest of the Committee, and a procession was formed in the "Caxton Room," where the Archbishop of York offered up a dedicatory prayer, and Sir C. Reed read a paper, stating that the object of the exhibition was twofold—viz., the celebration of the quatercentenary of the art of printing, and the fiftieth anniversary of the Printers' Corporation. Mr. Gladstone then held up a "rough proof" of the catalogue, and declared the exhibition open. At the luncheon which followed, and at which the Emperor of Brazil was present, Mr. Gladstone, as chairman, spoke at some length on the character and career of Caxton, and the incidents connected with the introduction of the art of printing into this country. Towards the close of his speech he made the singular blunder of claiming, as an instance of the progress made in the art, that a copy of the Caxton Memorial Bible had been entirely produced in sixteen hours. "Sixteen hours ago," said he, "it was not bound, it was not folded, it was not printed, and the type was not set up;" the fact being that it had been printed from stereotype plates within the specified time; but as to setting up the type, a contemporary remarks that "all the printing houses of all the Universities in the world could not have performed so Herculean a task." It has since been stated that the book, a copy of which is to be presented to the Earl of Beaconsfield, was printed in Oxford and bound in London within twelve consecutive hours, ten copies being delivered at South Kensington before 2 P.M. The book consists of 1,052 pages 16mo., minion type, and is bound in Turkey morocco, bevelled boards, flexible back, gilt lettered on back, side, inside cover, and is free from a "set off" or any blemish. It contains an explanatory inscription and title, "In Memoriam Gul. Caxton," with the occasion and date of the edition printed on each of the thirty-three sheets.

GREAT FIRES.——An extensive fire occurred in Pimlico on Tuesday. Breaking out in a large timber yard, the flames quickly spread to a number of houses surrounding it, of which no fewer than twenty-four were more or less damaged. An immense crowd of spectators were attracted to the scene, and were with difficulty kept in order by the 150 policemen, and a like number of Foot Guards, who were marched to the spot.—Another large fire is reported from Bradford, where the business premises of three merchant firms have been destroyed, the total damage being estimated at 100,000*l.*—The Lord Mayor has consented to convene a public meeting in aid of the sufferers by the disastrous fire at St. John's, New Brunswick, and Lord Carnarvon and Lord Kimberley are to be asked to lend a helping hand. The Mansion House Fund amounts to over 3,000*l.* It was stated that 2,800 had been collected in Manchester, and 2,200*l.* in Liverpool.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Archbishops and Bishops and about 300 of the clergy dined with the Lord Mayor, at the Mansion House, on Wednesday. The Primate responded to the principal toast.—General Grant, on Tuesday, received a deputation of representative working men, who presented him with an address of welcome. On Wednesday (Independence Day) a number of American residents in London were invited to meet him at the United States' Embassy, and on Thursday he received an address from the Corporation of Folkestone before embarking for the Continent. The General is expected at Berlin towards the end of the present month, and will go thence to Russia.—A public garden, which has been constructed at a cost of 5,000*l.* on the site of the historic churchyard of old St. Pancras Church, was last week inaugurated by Sir J. Hogg, M.P., Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the Baroness Burdett Coutts taking part in the ceremony by laying the first stone of a memorial sun-dial, which is to be erected at her expense.—Next Saturday H.R.H. the Prince of Wales is to unveil a marble statue of Alfred the Great, which has been executed by Count Gleichen, the Queen's cousin, and erected at Wantage, the birthplace of King Alfred.—A great portion of Morecambe Bay is to be reclaimed from the sea by a Land Company, who have already commenced the work. The cost is estimated at 150,000*l.*, and the reclaimed land is expected to be worth 400,000*l.*—The Manchester Water Works Committee propose to purchase Thirlmere, one of the Cumberland Lakes, and to convey water thence to the city by means of an aqueduct 100 miles in length.—On Saturday three men employed on a floating powder magazine off Gravesend were killed by the explosion of the store of explosives which were on board. A waterman who was rowing by at the time had a narrow escape, one of his oars being blown from his hand to a distance of at least thirty yards.—An accident similar to that which recently took place at Bath occurred at Saltash last week. A narrow wooden bridge connecting the steamboat pier with the shore suddenly gave way, and the crowd of persons upon it were precipitated into the water. Happily there were plenty of boats at hand, and no lives were lost.—On Sunday last Mr. Arthur Adderley, a son of the President of the Board of Trade, fell over a precipice at the Falls of Tummel, near Perth, and was drowned in the pool below.—An extraordinary and shocking railway accident occurred at Crewe on Tuesday last. The Scotch express was passing the station, when it came in contact with a long bar of iron, which was being carried in the opposite direction by a luggage train, and which projected over the other line of metals. This knocked away a portion of one of the carriages, and completely decapitated a lady who was seated within it, her husband and their child, who were seated beside her, escaping unhurt.

PARLIAMENT

THE events of the week in Parliament have not been of absorbing interest; but, such as they are, they have been absolutely dwarfed by the events of Tuesday-morning. For once in the history of the House, there have been two morning sittings on the same day. The second was arranged in accordance with custom; the first was altogether unarranged, growing out, in an unexpected manner, of a little difference between Mr. O'Connor Power and the Minister for War. Monday evening had, in accordance with instructions received from the Irish members through the exceptionally courteous mouthpiece of Mr. Butt, been devoted to Supply. On the previous Thursday night there had been much rebuking of Ministers for their dilatoriness in obtaining Supply. Mr. Rylands, mounting the high horse, had charged at the Treasury Bench, declaring in his most solemn and impressive manner that never was there a Government like this for neglecting its business and making it necessary to take votes on account. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, ordinarily the mildest of men, was so moved by this groundless and cruel charge that he girded at Mr. Rylands in quite a lively manner, finishing off for the night that estimable, amiable, but not precisely brilliant member. The Irish members, beholding a fray, dashed in, and naturally taking the lead in anything that betrayed a difference of opinion, they presently had all the debate between themselves and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the result indicated above—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, lectured by Mr. Butt, humbly promised that henceforward Supply should be taken de die in diem on all Government nights.

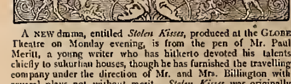
Thus on Thursday the estimates for War were put down as the first order of the day, and Mr. Cathorne Hardy arrived with a breast full of hope and a despatch box full of papers, prepared to finish the estimates of which he has charge. But at the outset his progress was barred by a number of notices of amendment, which, according to the good old constitutional maxim, had to be discussed before Supply could be granted. Even when these were disposed of an enemy rose up out of the Ministerial household, and inadvertently and undesignedly, but not the less effectively, stopped the unfortunate Minister for War from obtaining his supplies. Captain Stanley, the Financial Secretary to the War Office, undertook to defend the policy of the department in the matter of the Militia. This he did in a speech of tremendous length and no particular point, growing for his own part so obfuscated that it is no wonder the House was wholly unable to follow his drift. But the captain gallantly stuck at the trail, pursuing his own meaning through a wilderness of words, and, though he never came up with it, he succeeded in occupying the time of the House for nearly three-quarters of an hour.

This landed the Committee beyond midnight, on the near side of which lurks that lion in the path, "the half-past twelve rule." Mr. Biggar was not in his place, but Mr. Parnell was there, ready for emergencies. Before he could interfere, however, an accident arose which rendered his interposition unnecessary, or at least gave it a variety of form. Mr. O'Connor Power had addressed to Mr. Gathorne Hardy an inconsequential question, which the right hon. gentleman, not unreasonably thinking there had been talking enough, made no sign of answering. This irritated Mr. Power, and by way of punishing the discourtesy of the Minister for War he determined to take the constitutional course of stopping Supply. The petulance of the movement was so obvious that the House resented it, and backed up Mr. Hardy in his objection. The little band of Irish members, recruited by the arrival of Mr. O'Donnell, who in many undesirable points more than compensates for the temporary absence of Mr. Biggar, cheerfully accepted the defiance, and braced themselves up for a long encounter. Mr. O'Connor Power having moved to report progress, and having been defeated, Mr. Parnell moved the alternative motion, that the chairman do leave the chair. This was also rejected, the figures being in the proportion of 100 to 5—a condition of affairs quite exhilarating to Captain Nolan, who as the Irish "whip" delights in leading forlorn hopes of this character. Major O'Gorman was present, but judiciously, and in view of the heat of the weather, abstained from exhausting himself by talk. But there was no need of his assistance. Mr. O'Connor Power is equal to a school of girls; Mr. Parnell is a practised utterer of many words which need not necessarily mean anything; whilst as for Mr. O'Donnell, there is about him a physical energy which sets time and exhaustion at defiance. Having, it is understood, received some education, which he has supplemented by desultory study of foreign politics, this gentleman is able at a moment's notice to launch out into a more or less incoherent description of the various constitutions of Europe.

This he did in the earlier hours of Tuesday morning, to the great weariness of the House and the audibly expressed disgust of Sir W. Edmonstone. Mr. Locke, who is not often in the House, chanced to be present on this occasion, and treated Mr. O'Donnell to a few plain words of a character not often heard on the floor of the House of Commons. He did not stop short of turning round to the new member, and whilst declining, from excessive anger, to look him in the face, threw over his shoulder the remark that he "saw him now for the first time, and Heaven knew he did not care if he never saw him again."

This little episode, with another in which Mr. Blake figured, and in which he terribly castigated Mr. Parnell for that gentleman's recent speech on Parliamentary affairs to a Sunday evening congregation, carried the House blithely through the morning hours. The minority of five were evidently prepared to sit, as Mr. O'Connor Power said, till the arrival of the New Zealander famed in historical essay. The pace was beginning to tell on Major O'Gorman, but he was plucky to the last, and strolled out for the last division with an air not less defiant and a step scarcely less buoyant than were observed when, six hours earlier, he entered upon the unequal contest. In the end the House was counted out at a quarter past seven, meeting again at two o'clock the same day, sitting till seven, adjourning till nine and sitting again till nearly half-past twelve, and then only being counted out at the sight of Mr. Whalley, prepared to give it a lengthy lecture on the question of the "Priest in Absolution."

On Wednesday it seemed for half-an-hour as if there would be no House at all, but by the end of that time sufficient members were assembled, and a mild, not to say dreary, debate took place throughout the afternoon on two Bills, one of which, Mr. O'Sullivan's, had no more chance of passing than if its object had been the beheading of the Prince of Wales.



THEATRES

A NEW drama, entitled Stolen Kisses, produced at the GLOBE Theatre on Monday evening, is from the pen of Mr. Paul Meritt, a young writer who has hitherto devoted his talents chiefly to suburban houses, though he has furnished the travelling company under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Billington with several plays not without merit. Stolen Kisses was originally produced at Liverpool a short time since, where it is said to have been received with much favour. It belongs to a class of pieces which for lack of a better name have become known as comedy-dramas. There is, to begin with, more of a story in it than is generally deemed necessary in a comedy; on the other hand its comedy scenes, in which the aim, at least, is to interest by character and amuse by pointed dialogue, have certainly nothing in common with melodrame. It is perhaps due to the author's study of suburban tastes that he has considered it advisable in the construction of his plot to introduce a peer with a terrible secret which places him absolutely in the power of a wealthy parvenu, besides a gentleman who, having sustained a wrong at the hands of a twin brother, nourishes in consequence a life-long hatred which induces him to take delight in heaping humiliation and reproach upon this unfraternal wrongdoer. The scenes which arise out of these matters are somewhat artificial in character; though Mr. Ryder as the parvenu—who, it may be observed, is also the stern and injured brother—acts with a degree of force and sincerity which goes a long way to redeem these defects. There is a great deal of vigour and pathos in Mr. A. Garner's acting as the ex-pantomimist, though he might have given some little relief to the tone of incurable depression of spirits which he maintains throughout. The fierce reproaches and the bitter taunts with which Mr. Ryder assails him become almost ludicrous from the manifestly superfluous energy with which they are accompanied. Some of the best scenes in the piece arise from the relations between a young lady named Temple and her two admirers, Fred Gay, a medical student, represented by Mr. D'Arley, and the Hon. Felix Freemantle, a part assigned to Mr. Leathes. Miss Foote, whose fate it has hitherto been to represent for the most part only consumptive heroines, plays the part of Miss Temple with a very natural and easy flow of spirits; and there is a vast deal of amusement arising from her lover, Fred Gay's, inseparable attachment for his cornet, the notes of which, though ever agreeable in the young lady's ears, constitute only an additional "fly in the ointment" of the moody parvenu. There are also very amusing interviews between Miss Temple and Felix Freemantle, who are so delighted with each other because each discovers that the other's affections are engaged elsewhere that their extravagant effusions of joy are mistaken for tokens of passionate attachment. All this, if not entirely new, is in the genuine spirit of comedy, and in these scenes the dialogue reaches a level of merit which is unfortunately not evenly sustained throughout the piece. Though crude at times in conception and and execution, the piece indicates considerable promise, and it unquestionably affords a good deal of amusement to the audience.

A new and revised edition of Lady Audley's Secret, the dramatised version of Miss Braddon's novel of that name, has been brought out at the OLYMPIC. The piece has been extended to four acts, and some attempt has been made to introduce comedy scenes by way of relief to the somewhat melodramatic gloom which pervades the play, which still, however, follows closely the lines of the tale. It is in many respects powerfully acted. Miss Pateman's Lady Audley is a picturesque and vigorous performance, wanting little but a truer sense of proportion and of the importance of not overtaxing the feelings of the spectator. Mr. Henry Neville's earnest and forcible style gives great interest to the part of Robert Audley. By way of after-piece the management have produced a version of François Coppée's Luthier de Cremone, in which Mr. H. Neville, who is the adaptor of the little piece, performs with picturesque art and a rough kind of pathos the part of the hunchback, whose generous self-sacrifice constitutes the basis of the play. A pleasing young actress, Miss Gerard, sustains with grace and refinement the part of the violin-maker's daughter.

Madame Chaumont's appearances at the GAIETY have again proved more successful in attracting audiences than any of the series of French performances hitherto given under Mr. Hollingshead's rule. It is doubtful, indeed, whether any foreign actress ever enjoyed in England a more genuine popularity. Besides the regular evening performance, Madame Chaumont and her company will perform this morning in two of her most popular pieces, and will sing some of those songs, or rather musical scenes, for which she has so great a renown. The whole series of French performances at the Gaiety Theatre is under the immediate direction of Mr. M. L. Mayer.

A special performance of Othello at the OPERA COMIQUE on Friday last served to introduce to English audiences a new aspirant for dramatic honours in the person of M. Arno Marque, a French gentleman. M. Marque, who has attained a fair mastery over the difficulties of English accent, played the part of the Moor in the earlier scenes with every indication of careful study, albeit with some want of force. In the more passionate scenes of the last three acts his lack of physical power was all the more apparent from the violence of his action and his hurried utterances, which became now and then absolutely unintelligible to the audience. On the whole we fear that M. Marque has only furnished another example of the truth that something more than study, intelligence, and good taste is required to make a great tragic actor.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL.——Mr. and Mrs. German Reed will close their season on Saturday next, the 14th inst., and after, a short tour in the southern provinces, reopen the St. George's Hall again on the 1st of October. An extra night will be given on Monday, July 17th, for the benefit of Mr. John Williams, who has for many years been connected with the entertainment.

Monday next, July 9, will be the 800th night of Our Boys at the VAUDEVILLE.

THE RIPON HOUSE AMATEURS got through their week at the ROYALTY very creditably considering that there was a change of performance each evening. On the last night (Saturday) Mr. Charles Sleigh himself appeared as Matthew Elmore in Lovell's play of Love's Sacrifice. He played carefully and intelligently, but has hardly the physical capacity necessary for the part. Mr. Crofton as Paul Lafont, and Miss MacMahon as Margaret Elmore, received well-merited applause.

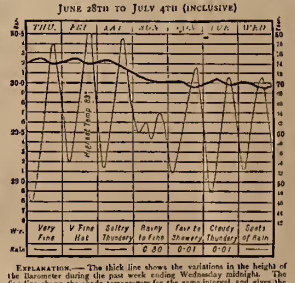
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

JUNE 28TH TO JULY 4TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather over the south-eastern parts of England remained very hot until the close of last week, the highest point reached in the shade being 83°, on Friday, the 29th ultimo. On Sunday, the 1st instant, there was a very considerable change. Heavy clouds were formed, and from about 8.30 a.m. to 3.30 p.m. we had a steady fall of rain, after which the sky cleared somewhat. Since that that time the sky has been cloudy all over the country, and thunderstorms have been frequent. Around London the showers have been very partial, and although on Tuesday evening, the 3rd instant, there were only a few very slight falls of rain in the southern suburbs, yet 0·35 inch of rain fell in Hackney, and an extremely heavy storm of hail was experienced in Camden Town and St. John's Wood. The barometer was highest (30·26 inches) on Friday, the 28th ultimo; lowest (29·96 inches) on Monday, the 2nd instant; range, 0·30 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (83°) on Friday, the 29th proximo; lowest (47°) on Thursday, the 28th ultimo; range, 36°. The interference with the normal daily range of temperature caused by the rain on Sunday, the 1st instant, is shown very strikingly in the diagram. Rainfall: Total fall, 0·32 inch, on three days; greatest fall, 0·30 inch, on Sunday, the 1st instant.

LONDON MORTALITY increased last week, and 1,300 deaths were registered, against 1,271 during the previous seven days, showing an increase of 29, but being 43 below the average, and at the rate of 19·2 per 1,000. There were 45 deaths from measles (an increase of 3), 24 from scarlet fever, 6 from diphtheria, 28 from whooping-cough (a decline of 7), 26 from different forms of fever (an increase of 4), 50 from diarrhœa (a decrease of 4), and 44 from small-pox, the same as last week. The Metropolitan Asylum Small-pox Hospitals contained 646 patients on Saturday last. There were 2,291 births registered, against 2,270 the previous week. There were 58·4 hours of sunshine last week out of the 115·7 hours that the sun was above the horizon. The mean temperature was 61·6 deg., or 0·4 above the average.

SCRAPS

THE FRESCOES BY FLANDRIN, which adorn the nave of the Church of St. Vincent de Paul in Paris, are being cleaned with bread-crumbs, under the superintendence of the well-known painter, M. Lemaire.

THE WESTMINSTER AQUARIUM now contains in one of the long tanks a shoal of young whitebait brought from Southend some weeks ago. The fish are in excellent condition, and are said to be daily growing more and more like herrings.

THE FESTIVAL OF THE NEWSVENDORS' INSTITUTION will be held at Willis's Rooms on the 10th inst., under the presidency of Mr. Serjeant Cox and a distinguished company. We wish success to this deserving cause, worthy of public support.

ONE OF THE SOUTH AMERICAN BOAS in the Reptile House at the Zoological Gardens has just produced twenty young ones, all alive and strong. They have not yet been fed, but bite freely enough if anything is placed near them. They are from 15 to 18 inches in length.

A PICTURE ATTRIBUTED TO PERUGINO has been discovered in the Church of St. Pierre, near Vaucluse. The painting, which represents the Adoration of the Shepherds, was hidden away in the loft of the church, and is in an excellent state of preservation, the colours being perfectly bright and fresh.

THE CHEAPEST NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD, the People's Journal, has been brought out at Calcutta for the modest sum of one pice per copy (4 pice go to ½d.). Readers of this cheap sheet, however, are frankly informed that, although brief and popular articles on scientific, legal, social, and political matters may be expected, "learned and elaborate research in any of these departments is beyond our scope, and our readers will be disappointed if they are to look for such articles in our columns."

CREMATION is being seriously discussed in Paris, where the subject of burial in the present over-crowded state of the cemeteries has long been a difficult question. At Wednesday's sitting of the Municipal Council it was decided to petition for a law permitting cremation, and one of the members suggested that a competition should be organised for the best mode of disposing of bodies by burning. This competition should be opened at once, and continue till the end of the year, and all plans must be expeditious, inodorous, and economical. A jury of fifteen members would decide on the best method after experiments had been made of every reasonable plan. It was also proposed to present a law authorising cremation to the new Chamber.

PICTURES OF THE DUTCH AND FLEMISH SCHOOL have marvellously increased in value within the last half-century. In France this has been especially noticeable of late years; and while during Republican and Imperial times from 1795 to 1825 paintings by Snyders, Breughel, and Hondekoeter formerly bought for 200*l*. and 250*l*. fell to 3*l*. and 4*l*., after the return of the Bourbons the prices again rose steadily to the present period. The pictures of Hobbema, Teniers, Wouvermans, and Rembrandt show the greatest increase in value. For example, Rembrandt's "The Gilder" in 1802 was knocked down for 200*l*., and many years after it was bought by the Duc de Morny for 1,000*l*., while after the Duke's death in 1855 it was sold for 6,200*l*.

EDELWEISS—the fluffy white flower dear to Alpine climbers and superstitious brides—is at length to be legally protected, such a measure being rendered necessary to prevent the plant from becoming totally extinct. In the Engadine a law has been passed prohibiting the sale of the edelweiss in its fresh and living condition, the first offence to be visited with a fine of 4s. The Swiss children are the worst offenders, as they pull up the plant roughly by the roots, and pester travellers to buy a tiny bouquet of edelweiss or other "Alpenblumen" for 50 cents, while in the tourist season nearly every passenger in the homeward bound steamers to the Swiss lake-side towns wears a tuft in his hat as a trophy of his mountaineering exploits, be they even confined to a railway trip up the Rigi.

THE PREJUDICE AGAINST COLOURED PEOPLE in the United States shows little signs of abating despite the increased privileges of the negro of late years, and a striking instance of this aversion has recently occurred at the Military Academy at West Point. A coloured cadet entered the institution in 1873, and his classmates, unable to deny his equal right to education, refused to a man to exchange a single word with one of a despised race, but effectually sent him to Coventry. The poor lad never heard his own voice except in the recitation-room, and until another negro entered West Point last year, he was literally alone. Out of the seventy-five students—all citizens of a Republic whose watchword is equality—not one had the boldness to break down the barrier, yet the negro cadet had courage enough to endure four years of total isolation for the sake of his studies.

LONDON AND PARISIAN FASHIONABLE LIFE differ widely in their various features, according to a Gallic critic in the Constitutionnel. Fashionable circles in Paris only awake at night; in London, on the contrary, they are astir all day and all night. A Parisienne spends the morning in bed, or lounging at home in her dressing-gown, and would regard any one with horror who invited her to breakfast or lunch. Englishwomen, however, have a better idea of the value of time, and spend their mornings in healthy exercise, such as riding and walking, while after lunch there are endless attractions and exhibitions of all kinds, garden and water parties, &c., to occupy the time till dinner, without including the innumerable scientific, literary, and charitable meetings, in which the English aristocracy, declares the writer, take so great and active an interest, and for which the French nobility care as little as "a fish for an apple."

THE FALLS OF NIAGARA have lost a well-known feature in Table Rock, the last piece of which broke off and fell into the river on May 24th. Table Rock was a wide ledge, projecting from fifty to sixty feet over the precipice on the Canada side near the Horseshoe Fall, and commanded a splendid view, while over 4,000 names of visitors had been carved upon it. Only half of the original rock remained, as portions had given way in 1818, 1829, and 1850, the piece which fell in 1829 being nearly the size of half an acre, and causing such a shock as to resemble an earthquake. The mass which gave way last month weighed sixty tons, and the shock when the rock struck the water was distinctly felt three miles from the fall. Several of the trees which grew on the rock are now standing in the river as erect as when in their original places, and where the rock shelved off from the bank, at a distance of twenty feet from the top can be seen the root of a tree estimated to be two feet in diameter. The fall of Table Rock is supposed to have been caused by the sapping power of the water running under the bank.

FASHIONS

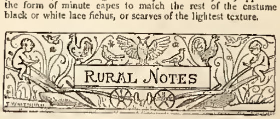
It is no easy task to give a summary of the fashions for July, 1877, in Paris and London, so varied are the materials used, so artistic the combinations of colour, so suitable the designs for every age and figure, and for all times and seasons.

Never were black and white so much worn as the foundation on which to display an endless variety of trimmings and tasteful mixtures of colour. Amongst numerous elegant toilettes at a recent fête, one of the most remarkable was of rich black silk, with a very long train skirt, trimmed up the front with a double pleating, lined with deep red silk, open over a petticoat of the same startling hue; the skirt was turned up with red, and the deep pleated flounce which was round it was lined to match; the bonnet and parasol corresponded with the rest of this striking toilette, the wearer of which was very tall and of a commanding appearance. A stylish but more subdued costume worn by a married lady was of black silk, with a violin back of black velvet, which trimming was carried down the skirt, and gradually widened, until at the hem of the long train the width was a yard and a quarter. The front breadth was of velvet trimmed with handsome gimp ornaments graduated; bonnet of white plush, trimmed with sky blue velvet and ostrich feathers. A severely classical costume was of white cashmere, with no other trimming but a two-inch border of faded green and brown leaves, most exquisitely worked in chenille; the dress was somewhat of the Princess form, but was semi-loose-fitting, fastened at the waist with a thick cord and tassels; the bonnet was of coarse white straw, trimmed with leaves and cherries, a scarf of old point black lace was artistically knotted at the back.—There was a great tendency towards simplicity of style, especially with young people at the fête above-mentioned; there were some young girls who might have stepped out of one of Morland's or his contemporary painters' pictures, so neat were they in their attire; white cambric or grenadine dresses, fitting tight to the figure, in some cases actually without a train (these were, however, exceptional), a small round or pointed fichu, trimmed as was the skirt, with a pleated frill; elbow sleeves, and long black lace mittens. The bonnets were of the Pamela shape, of fine white straw lined and trimmed with white satin, a bunch of poppies and corn were the only bits of colour about these modest costumes, which attracted more notice by their simplicity than did the most gorgeous attire. The Pamela-shaped bonnet is very becoming to some faces, whilst for others the more dashing Gainsborough hat is appropriate; public favour is almost equally divided between the two; we are inclined to give the palm to the latter, which suits almost every type of countenance under—we will give a wide margin, and say—thirty-five years old! Some of these hats, which were recently shown to us, were really charming. One was of coarse straw, the brim moderately wide, lined with dark emerald green velvet, and edged with a narrow silver cord; the crown was covered with ostrich feathers fastened with two dark green wings. The next was of pearl grey velvet, lined with satin of the same colour and shade, and trimmed with feathers to match, amongst which nestled a deep crimson full-blown rose—a second rose was placed above the left ear. Another was of white Leghorn lined with blue satin in fine puffings, trimmed with blue satin Alsatian bows and minor convolvuli. Prettiest of the group was one of white felt lined with white satin in very small puffings, a long ostrich feather went round the crown, and fell on the right shoulder; in the front was a bunch of small ostrich feather tips, in which were mixed roses of many hues and shades, a bouquet to correspond was placed under the brim. With these Gainsborough hats it is impossible to wear a veil, yet when the hair is worn waved or frizzed the least wind will blow it across the eyes in a most uncomfortable manner. To meet this difficulty a Parisian coiffeur has arranged a filet invisible so fine, that although it keeps the hair in its place it is really invisible; these nets are made specially for and to match the front hair; they will be found most comfortable, particularly for the seaside. Before quitting the subjects of hats and bonnets we must mention that the shapes like a Swiss milking stool are much in vogue; as a rule they are becoming to but few, and are very ungraceful; for the most part they are trimmed with velvet and fruit, large bunches of cherries hanging by their stalks, plums, ripe and unripe, currants, red, white, and black, and even half-grown oranges. Most of us know by experience that these coarse straw bonnets or hats are stiff and heavy, and when overladen with trimming they are unbearable for summer weather, and should not be adopted for the next two months. As a contrast to the above may be mentioned some simple little bonnets, the foundation of light willow covered with quilted or fluted ruching of muslin, white, or of some pale delicate colour, with no trimming save bows of the same; for a homely picnic, school feast, or water party, where economy without dowdiness, and comfort combined with style, are desirable, these neat little head-dresses will be most welcome.

Although white dresses of every description are very fashionable, and in many cases most economical, they quickly lose their freshness, hence materials which are light, cool, and durable are best adapted for country, and even London wear, at this season, when the blanchisseuse may and will assert her independence. From a well-known firm in Paris we have received some carefully assorted patterns of materials, many of them very inexpensive. For morning wear zephyr cloth or cambric, in a variety of soft, neutral tints, plain and checked, Grenadin mousse, batiste, a peculiar but effective variation on this material in parti-coloured stripes; for an afternoon toilette the mohair crépon, a silky texture made in plain colours or parti-coloured hair stripes, is very stylish, and requires no further trimming than Renaissance lace and bows of twi-coloured ribbons. The Holbein lace may also be used for these materials, but is more suitable for a black, stone grey, or white foundation. Gaze façonée is a still more dressy material, which in spite of its delicate appearance will bear a large amount of packing and crushing, and is therefore calculated for a visiting dress, where only a brief stay is intended.

A few words as to parasols, which are perfect works of art. A real article de luxe, for show more than use, was made of the clearest silk grenadine, hand-embroidered in shaded green leaves, below which was a Grecian border; the lining was of white silk, the fringe waved and of many artistically blended colours; on the top of the ivory stick was a bouquet of pink roses.—The parasol must correspond with the trimmings of the dress, if not also with its materials.

As to the make of costumes in general, there is little if any change, except a marked tendency towards simplicity; a long train skirt Princess shape, with a double frill or ruche on or under the hem, is one of the favourite modes; tight bodices are laced up the front instead of the back, the more convenient style of the two. Mantles or jackets are said to be indispensable for the promenade, but during this sultry weather they only appear in the form of minute capes to match the rest of the costume; black or white lace fichus, or scarves of the lightest texture.



RURAL NOTES

The Weather.——According to accounts from all parts of the compass in the British Isles, the weather has been of the proverbial character—variable. There has been too much rain in the north, too much sun in the south. Wheat is suffering in one part from too much moisture, in other localities it is noted that the want of rain has been inimical to the growth of grass. Farmers are not always the best judges of that which are best for themselves. The sun shines and the rain falls where best they list, and this year, taking the land generally, they have shone and fallen upon pleasant places. The crops will be light in hay, except where farmers were 'cute enough to stay the scythe and the mowing machine. Those who have cut first will fare the worst, as the genial falls of Sunday and Monday have wrought a wonderful change upon the face of the rye-grass and the meadow hay, and indeed upon all crops except the wheat, which may suffer a little; and this is a misfortune, considering that we depend considerably upon our supplies from the borders of the Black Sea and the Baltic.

The Colorado Beetle.——This injurious little creature (a kind of fish torpedo against potato farmers), which can swim as well as fly, has once more made its appearance on the banks of the Rhine. It has been diagnosed, according to accounts, in that city of various "stinks" too numerous to be mentioned, and official warning has been issued against its approach to these shores. The insect was figured a year or two ago in The Graphic, and prescriptions given as to how best to get rid of it—when it comes. In the opinion of the writer of these "Notes," so far as this country is concerned, the Colorado beetle is a bugbear. Giving it all the destructive powers it is said to possess on the other side of the Atlantic, it cannot possibly do more harm than the blight which thirty years ago was the motive power for the abolition of the Corn Laws. The cause of the blight, which has frequently exhibited itself since the days of Sir Robert Peel's cheap loaf, has never yet been satisfactorily ascertained. A hecatomb of pamphlets have been published upon the subject to leave "confusion worse confounded;" and cultivators in Penzance and Penrhyn, in Lincolnshire and the Lothians, in Dublin and Donegal, are now at their wits' end concerning it. Perhaps it may have been this identical foreign beetle that has been the cause of all our woes, and the occasion of sombre discussion in the House of Commons. Would that it were so, because we have the remedies ready to our hands. They are these, according to Canadian authorities:—"1. Searching for and crushing every potatoe beetle wherever found. 2. Frequent visits to the potato fields, and searching for the eggs deposited on the under side of the leaves of the potato vine. 3. Watching for the presence of the larvæ on the beds and on the leaves of the plants in order to destroy them by means of Paris green, the only substance yet discovered to be effectually operative on a large scale for the destruction of the insect in its larvæ state." The instructions are a little too elaborate, we fancy.

> See ocean into tempest toss'd,
> To waft a feather or to drown a fly.

Miscellaneous.——The Game Laws, as often pointed out in this column, are merely legal fictions to conjure with. Years ago it was stated that Mr. M'Lagan's Bill was the only one propounded in Parliament likely to settle the question, and Commons and Lords, with modifications, have accepted it. It is a triumph to Mr. M'Lagan, but it is doubtful whether those for whom he so manfully fought will rest and be thankful.—A Clydesdale Stud Book is a record much wanted. Lord Dunmore has not only accepted the task of editorship, but has generously resolved to defray the cost of the first volume. All entries should be sent to his lordship's residence in London by the 15th of the present month.—An Ayrshire Stud Book is also on the tapis. It is a pity that these beautiful creatures and prolific milkers should have been left so long without a pedigree.—The show season will soon be in its heyday. Several local shows of importance have been held with success, and the Royal Agricultural Society of England (commencing rather awkwardly in the middle of the week, and hanging over another) promises to excel even Birmingham last year, which is saying much.—The locale of the Highland and Agricultural Society has for its name this year "The Grey Metropolis of the North," and never has its entries in all classes of stock and implements been more numerous.—Mr. Mechi requests us to state that, owing to his advanced age (over seventy-five), the Tiptree annual gatherings will be discontinued; but he hopes that his brother agriculturists will come and inspect his crops before or during harvest.

New Novels

"A Woman-Hater," by Charles Reade, D.C.L. (3 vols.: Blackwood).—The most striking characteristic of this, as of every other of Mr. Charles Reade's novels, we should say, was the buoyant, even exuberant, fulness of life that flows through it from end to end. Yet we are conscious that his stories possess some quality besides which gives them their peculiar flavour, for we meet with equal animation in other works—say in Mr. Trollope's "American Senator"—which impress us quite differently. Perhaps the speciality lies in this—that, as we think we may have said before, in Mr. Reade's novels we do not seem to be so much reading a story as listening to a brilliant raconteur, who colours the whole of his narrative with his own personality. It is Charles Reade himself who is to be seen and heard on every page of his books. His imagination is quick at seizing and making the most of broad and telling effects as a raconteur's should be, but it never broods. He seems to us to have carefully watched human nature on the outside rather than attempted to probe into its depths; he shows no turn for anything of the nature of spiritual vivisection. All his characters are dashed off with a few bold free strokes of the brush, and whatever cannot be done in that way he is content to leave undone. Fanny Dover here, for instance, "a keen, sensible, girl, and not a downright wicked one; only born artful," would have been just the personage Balzac or Thackeray would have made a perfect "study" of; in Mr. Reade's hands she is indeed eminently amusing, but nothing more, because he does not care to get to the roots of his own conception. In these remarks on what seems to us the character of Mr. Reade's genius we hope we shall not be understood as implying any wish that it were other than it is, or any dissatisfaction with the powerful and, we may go so far as to say, fascinating, tale of which we have to speak, though our words concerning it must needs be few. Of course it would hardly be its author's if it were not full of whimsicalities, and vagaries, and tricks of style, which might vex and offend coming from anyone else, but which in Mr. Reade's case we only laugh at, feeling that it is "his way." There is no doubt that that exuberance of life which we have already referred to as a characteristic of his novels is continually leading him into a grotesqueness closely bordering on caricature, and it is only his splendid verve and that artistic sense of fitness which never really deserts him which carry him in safety along the perilous path he treads. With regard to the personages whose acquaintance we make in this novel, most of them belong to types with which Mr. Reade has long ago made us familiar, though they are not the less pleasant and welcome companions on that account. As we might expect, the "Misogyn," as Mr. Reade delights to call him, whose name is Harrington Vizard, a Barfordshire squire of between thirty and thirty-five, of ancient descent and ample fortune—is the veriest impostor; railing at women with his lips, but coaxed, bullied, and domineered over by any member of the sex who chooses to take the trouble. All the same, he is a fine conception; as thorough a specimen of the highminded English gentleman as Mr. Reade has ever given us—and that is saying not a little. The villain of the piece, the handsome and fascinating Edward Severne, who rivals Charles the Second by his exquisite politeness, whilst, as he says, "engaged in dying," is almost an exact counterpart of the villain in "A Simpleton," whose name we do not remember, resembling him even in the most un-masculine facility with which he can produce tears on fitting occasions. As for the heroines, Ina Klosking, the great singer, and Zoe Vizard, Harrington's half-sister, they are just the ideal mature woman and girl as the author always conceives of them; creatures of impulse, not reason, of warm affections, and not above a little innocent trickery when it suits their purpose. But Mr. Reade has hardly ever written a novel which was not intended to point a moral, or plead a cause, or expose an abuse, and his aim here is to give a helping hand to the "medical women," or "doctresses," as he rightly frames the word, one of whom, Miss Rhoda Gale, M.D. of the University of Montpellier, plays a very prominent part in his pages. He pleads the cause of these, as he maintains, much-wronged ladies with an ardour and eloquence all his own; but of course the matter is not one to enter upon in a notice like this. "A Woman-Hater" is in every way most characteristic of its author, and will doubtless be, as it deserves to be, one of the prime favourites of the season.

"Winnie's History," by M. C. M. Simpson, author of "A Long Summer's Day" (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—Unless our memory is much at fault "A Long Summer's Day," published some years back, impressed us as not without some good points, but as in the main a very striking instance of > Story, God bless you, I have none to tell, sir.

In that case Mrs. Simpson is to be congratulated on having made an unmistakeable advance, for "Winnie's History" is an excellent story, and excellently told—told, too, with a certain polish and savoir vivre that show us we are dealing with a woman of the world. We could have wished, indeed, that the author had lingered longer over those chapters of her work in which she introduces us to Parisian society such as it was in the palmy days of the Second Empire. That portion of Winnie's "history" which we are here invited to study is concerned chiefly with the tale of her married life as the wife of Count Émile de Canisy, a scion of a very old French Legitimist family, a gifted, charming, and with all his selfishness, thoroughly amiable person, but uncomfortably given both to simulation and dissimulation. As Winnie Glendower has all a frank English girl's horror and contempt for falsehood it is not wonderful that when she discovers that her husband has deceived her in one matter—his culpability, be it said, is by no means as grave as she believes—she should rush to the conclusion that he is altogether false and faithless, and harden her heart against him, though making herself as wretched as she makes him. Her obduracy may seem excessive, but we think it is as characteristic of her depth of feeling as the stedfastness with which she clings to Émile's memory when, after they have been reconciled, she loses him at the end of a few weeks of perfect happiness. But we have neither space nor inclination to tell the story in detail here. The troubles of Winnie's worldly-minded sister, Lina, who has married a millionaire with a taste for natural history, are very amusing. "How could you bear," she says, "to live with a man who is on the look-out for two sorts of bugs? I assure you it preys on me night and day." There is a Mrs. Hamilton, too, in the book who gives utterance to a great many sayings both sharp and true. Altogether "Winnie's History" is a book of decided merit, and gives us a right to look for yet better things from the author in the future.

"Frank Carey: A Story of Victorian Life," by the author of "Sketches of Australian Life and Scenery" (3 vols.: Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.).—"In telling 'Frank Carey's Story,'" says the author in a preface, "I have endeavoured to convey a true idea of our ordinary life; to portray people, places, and circumstances as we commonly find them in the class with which the story is concerned." Far be it from us to say that he has not succeeded in the attempt; but if so life in Australia, or perhaps we should say Victoria, must be a somewhat poor and tame affair. Of course in this day it is hardly necessary to say that the chronicle of dull lives need not be dull reading; but to give interest to such a chronicle the writer must possess other qualifications besides local knowledge and familiarity with the ways of a class—which are all, as far as we can see, that the author of "Frank Carey" can lay claim to.

"In the Shadow of God: Sketches of Life in France during the Eighteenth Century," by the author of "The Spanish Brothers," &c. (Dalby, Isbister, and Co.), consists of two tales, "In the Desert" and "In the City," which have appeared in the pages of the Sunday Magazine and Sunday at Home respectively. They are both written to depict the condition of the persecuted Protestants of France in the last century, and, making all due allowance for peculiarities of tone which we do not greatly admire, are tales of fair merit in their way—the latter, to our thinking, the better of the two. "Renruth," by Henry Tanner (Samuel Tinsley), is a flimsy and foolish story by a writer who, we should think, would have spoiled a better one in the telling, even if he had it to tell.

A RIDE FROM TAURANGA TO ROTOMAHANA

I LEFT Auckland for Tauranga in a little coasting steamer, and at Tauranga hired a horse at 7s. 6d. per day for the journey. The first day I rode from Tauranga to Ohinimutu, a distance of forty-two miles. The road is a good one, over fern-covered hills for the first twelve miles, and then for the next eighteen miles through one of the densest forests imaginable. The trees grow to an enormous height, and the undergrowth is thick with bushes, ferns of every description, and a kind of creeper called souple jack. This souple jack is really a sort of cane, very strong and pliant, and twines from tree to tree in a way which makes it excessively difficult to get through the bush.

Emerging from the forest I came again on to fern-covered hills, where as far as the eye can reach nothing is to be seen but ferns to right and left, while in front lies the great lake Rotorua, with the little settlement of Ohioimutu twelve miles away, round which I could see great jets of steam puffing up into the air in all directions. Along the flat I pushed my horse to a canter, and having left Tauranga at 7.30 in the morning, reached Ohinimutu at a little after five o'clock, both beast and rider tolerably tired.

All the land in this district belongs to the natives, and settlers are not allowed to purchase from them except the transaction goes through the Native Lands Office at Wellington. Ohinimutu is a large native village with a few stores, a couple of accommodation houses called hotels, and a place where you can get shelter and feed for horses.

I had heard a great deal about the Maoris, both good and bad, but after a few days among them I came away not at all prepossessed in their favour. I had met numbers of them on the road, and had always been courteously saluted with Ten-arkuhi, which I suppose is their good day. One young woman insisted on shaking hands with me, a token of good will I could well have dispensed with, as her digits were none of the cleanest.

My first impression after dinner, when settling comfortably down to my pipe, was that my stomach was very much out of order, and that a horrible taste pervaded my mouth. I found, however, that it was simply the sulphur which impregnated the air, and gave a flavour to everything I took. All round the edge of the lake this "medicinal" water is bubbling and shooting into the air, and it is necessary to be exceedingly careful to keep on the beaten tracks as, if the traveller ventures off them, he may find the ground suddenly give way under his feet, and himself up to his waist in boiling water.

The inhabitants praise the virtues of this water in the most extravagant terms, and I believe it has effected some really remarkable cures in chronic cases of rheumatism and sciatica.

The next morning I walked all round the village, and visited the "Warré" or "Town Hall" of the natives. Most of the little houses were made of the native flax, tied in bundles, and very well thatched. Some of them were built on piles to lift them above the swamp, and most had either in front, or close by, a natural warm bath which they used both for cooking and washing. A flax basket full of potatoes is suspended in the mouth of one of the small holes, and in a very short time is pulled up again, the potatoes steamed and cooked to perfection.

The natives, as a rule, seemed a drunken, dissolute lot, intercourse with the whites has not done them any good, and generally those English who live among them, and who are called Pakeha-Maoris, are most unscrupulous men to whom all means are good.

They are terribly grasping people to deal with; I would rather do business with a Jew and a Scotchman rolled into one than with a Maori. Fortunately, I had got fairly posted as to what I ought to pay, and not knowing the language stuck to any sum I first offered and refused to increase or decrease it a penny. The language seems a very easy one, the vowels are pronounced as in French, so that Pakeha must be read Par-ke-hah.

The Maories are fully alive to the value of their hold on the land and to the slavish fear of another war shown by the New Zealand Government. The mistake was to treat the natives too mildly when they were beaten, and now the Government tries to keep them in good temper by giving them blankets and sugar, and generally spoiling them. Another thrashing would do them a world of good. They are fine, well made men and women, with very animal faces, and running to flesh as they get older.

One evening I was at a dance in a school-house, ten miles from Ohinimutu, and the young girls danced beautifully, especially those who wore no boots—they were as light as it is possible to imagine. I danced a set of quadrilles, and my partner was a most stalwart young person, twisting me round with the utmost vigour; fortunately she was quite clean, and had, I think, combed her hair.

From Ohinimuti I rode to Wairoa, again through fern-covered hills and dense forest. The Acclimatisation Society has succeeded in introducing pheasants, and these birds have increased so rapidly in the excellent cover afforded by the fern, that in some places they are becoming a positive pest. They were continually getting up under my horse's feet as I rode along, looking very beautiful and making me long for a gun. I had to pass two more lakes before reaching Wairoa, one of them of a perfectly blue colour. The natives have some superstition with regard to this lake, and never venture on its waters.

At Wairoa I arranged for a party of natives to take me next day to the terraces, the sight of all others in this part of the country. The journey to the terraces of Rotomahana has to be made in a canoe for nine miles over the lake, then at the mouth of a creek the traveller leaves the canoe, and walks along the banks and up to the terraces, while the natives carry and drag the boat, and meet him two miles further on. The creek is always very rapid, and in consequence of there having been heavy rains was so swollen as to make the task of rowing up a sheer impossibility.

Next morning accordingly we started on the lake—myself, guide (an old Frenchman) and four natives (three men and a woman) as crew. The canoe was about 30 feet long, hollowed out of the trunk of a tree, and about 3½ feet wide in the middle, with no seats but big bunches of fern to sit on. I squatted down near the stern, one native behind to steer with his paddle and the guide, and the three others in front also working paddles. We had a very fair run over the lake, though the water began to get lumpy at one time. Sudden squalls are common about these parts, and the canoes are apt to get upset, sometimes the waters are so wild and high that nothing can live in them. Fortunately we arrived without accident, and landed at the mouth of the creek after a pull of two hours. In passing a big rock which juts out into the water we all threw pieces of fern upon it to propitiate the Devil, who is supposed to live there, and so ensure a safe voyage. Coming back, the journey over, the natives were no longer afraid of His Satanic Majesty, and so didn't trouble him with any further tribute.

The guide and I now left the crew to their task of working the canoe up the creek. We had about two miles to walk, and then came upon the White Terrace, which may be compared to a series of gigantic steps made of what looks like frosted alabaster. The water seems to have streamed from the top of the hill, to have made one terrace with a large pool in it, then to have trickled over, and formed another and so on down to the lake. I climbed to the top and looked down, the pools of water on each terrace or step were of the most perfect blue, very deep in the centre, and getting fainter towards the edges, the contrast against the white of the terrace was exquisitely beautiful, and below was the great lake, Rotomahana, spreading miles away, and surrounded by deep, fern-covered hills. The terraces have been formed by a deposit of silica in the water, and if anything is left in one of the pools for a month or two it becomes perfectly petrified. At the back of the Terraces was a pool of a deep green colour from a deposit of arsenic.

We next went on to the Geysers round the hill, and I could feel the ground trembling under my feet as I approached, and then we came upon an enormous hole from which steam was rushing in clouds. Presently the monster began to heave and groan, and then a great column of boiling water shot into the air, and after spouting for several moments gradually sank down again. This was repeated every few minutes. There were many of these places, big and small, some tiny ones only a few inches high. I tried to stop up one of the small ones with pieces of stone, but the little fellow was not to be beat, and after some convulsive-looking struggles shot everything out.

By this time I was pretty well tired, so the guide and I went down to the foot of the terraces, and found our crew already there, and cooking their dinner of potatoes in one of Nature's kettles. I had brought a loaf, a can of tinned mutton, and two bottles of stout with me, and did ample justice to our lunch. Then we crossed the lake in the canoe, and every now and again would come upon a spot where the water was bubbling from some geyser at the bottom. The second terrace we visited was formed apparently of the same deposit, but instead of being roughed, as if frosted, was perfectly smooth. It is pink in colour, but the pink was not very vivid, and is, I am told, gradually fading.

On our return we did not leave the canoe to walk down the creek, but shot it, the natives guided it with their paddles and, to use an Americanism, simply let it slide. It was perfectly marvellous to see the way they ran the long boat round the bends and sharp curves, the water actually boiling round us from the rapidity of motion. I am afraid to say how quickly we did the two miles, but we hardly seemed well started before we came out at the other end. When on the lower lake we found we had a fair wind, so the natives cut some saplings for masts, made sails of their blankets, and came back in the scantiest of clothing, but at a fine rattling speed. Each Maori got five shillings for the day's work.

The old woman sang all the way back, and turned the habit of wearing earrings to real practical use, passing her pipe through the hole where the jewel generally goes.

When I got back to Ohinimutu I found that an episode of Maori life had taken place there, the chief had killed his wife, or rather had so ill-treated her that she had died in consequence, the third he had served in this way. The poor man was quite inconsolable, and was sitting between two women, each with her arm round his neck, and every now and then giving vent to a most doleful howl. Whenever any one of importance dies, and in this case the woman was herself a chief and of importance irrespective of her husband's dignity, it is customary to hold what is called a "Tangi." All the relatives, men, women, and children, come from far and near, and indulge in the most abominable gluttony. All the time I remained the natives were pouring in, marching in Indian file, each fresh arrival being greeted by a howl on the part of the chief as he presented himself. The Maoris are fully alive to the value of the telegraph and had sent despatches wherever they could. Pigs were being killed wholesale, and a tremendous banquet was in course of preparation. The corpse was stretched under a little tent, and was being watched night and day to keep off the rats. These "Tangis" sometimes last four or five weeks, and the body gets into such a condition that it hardly hold together. When at length buried all the guests go home again, but before doing so they have a general howl. I started directly after breakfast for Tauranga, and again rode the forty-two miles in a day. The animal I had was a staunch little nag, carried me almost without a stumble, and did its work right well. I was told that the chief intended to starve himself to death, and had not tasted food for two days. I can't vouch for the truth of this, nor do I think, with the smell of roast pork about, he would hold out very long.

At Tauranga I was introduced to the chief of a tribe which lies on an island opposite. He pressed me to come and see him, wrote his name in my pocket-book, both in Maori and English, and accepted my card with immense pleasure. I was assured that if I did go he would make a great feast and give me the best he could. He accepted a fig of tobacco, and then began to beg for drink. I stood him a couple of glasses of beer, and then declined to do any more. I had no time to go over to the village, as the coasting steamer left the following day.

The Maoris are remarkably intelligent, and the children learn to do quite difficult sums in a very short space of time. It is the same with the men, they take readily to new work, and buckle to like tigers. But it is the same with one and all, they have no stability, and soon sink from great efforts to utter idleness.

THE OLDER PRINTERS

FULL wise was it in Mr. Gladstone, amidst much temptation to descant on progress, Walter presses, and Bibles printed, folded, and bound within the space of sixteen hours, to turn in preference to a more gracious theme, the nobler aspects of those long-buried worthies, to printers and publishers of whom Johann von Guttenberg and Caxton may be called the types. Printers and publishers—in the division of labour the very terms have half become dissociated. The title-page that bears at its foot the name of some almost historic firm oftener than not will show on the reverse a totally different legend, "Printed by So-and-So at B." Printers and publishers four hundred years ago were rather, indeed, type-founders, master-printers, authors, critics, and publishers in one. Was it to this combination of qualities that of all arts and mysteries few made more rapid progress than printing in the first century from its birth? A hundred years from the day when Johann Gansfleisch of Guttenberg, gentleman, first gave his famous Bible to the world printing—for type, for ink, for paper—stood quite as high as it does now. The best work of the latter part of the sixteenth century can be no more surpassed by modern skill than early Rembrandts by the best work of the Etching Club. Between the latter date and the introduction of steam, printing in most countries positively retrograded. It was in troth, a sort of fine art then. There was no type to buy or borrow, if some hard sentence had to be "set up" in Greek or Syriac. The type had to be invented, as well as made. As late as 1551 the Greek words in Turner's "Herbal" were represented by English characters. Syriac had to be printed in Hebrew up to the beginning of the next century. The Continent was far in advance of us in this. The Jews of Soncino gave Milan Hebrew characters not long after the great dispersion of the artificers of Maintz. Chalcondylas and his Cretan workmen brought the Greek type—collated for its capital letters with the ancient monuments, for its smaller characters with MSS. rich in those abbreviations and contractions that only recently vanished from our texts—to Milan first and then to Florence, whose masters just before had been the first of all Italians to cast their own type with the proud vaunt, "To Florentine ingenuity nothing is too hard." Aldus, in 1501, took for the pattern of his new Italic type the flowing manuscript of Petrarch. As late as 1558 a curious attempt at originality in the shape of a book printed in cursive capitals comes from the press of Granjon of Lyons.

The devices alone of these old printers would make a chapter in themselves as interesting as any book of knightly shields or blazons won on fields of battle. The olive tree of the Estiennes, with its modest motto, "Noli altum sapere sed time;" or the "Plus olei quam vini," sometimes assumed by Henri Estienne the elder in pleasant mockery of the "In vino veritas" of his rival, Martin of Alost; the hand and compass of the famous Plantin; the dolphin and anchor—emblems of accuracy and speed—of the Aldi; the mulberry of the Morels; were known wherever good types and carefully edited texts were in esteem. Honour, in sooth, went hand in hand with danger in these early days of the trade, when the press of Germany and Switzerland could scarce keep pace with the literature of the Reformation, and doctors of the Sorbonne watched for heresy in every new product of the King's Printing Office. If Francis I. and Marguerite of Valois lean over the presses of the elder Estienne, as had Edward IV. over those of Caxton, if one King's Printer is Dean of the Order of Regius Professors and another is King's Printer and Regius Professor to the University by turn, there is much, too, of peril to life and purse to be set down on the other side. More than one Estienne must go into exile; of Ferrandus of Brescia, and the greater Morel, tradition runs that they died ruined men; of Neobar, that he sickens to death with trouble and fatigue; of one Dolet, that he is burned alive; of his brother that his body is exhumed, burned, and its ashes scattered on the Place de Grève. There is little respect just then for copyright, and if Aldus is provoked to print a pamphlet pointing out errors by the hundred in works that profess to bear his name, what does the pirate but buy the pamphlet, suppress the preface, and publish the rest as his own errata! Nor are trades-unions quite unknown, and the same Aldus waxes quite vituperative in Greek and Latin over the "runaway and accursed slaves who, inspired by covetousness, mother of all things evil," had struck apparently for higher wages, and, 'God helping,' been so put down as to be bitterly sorry for their misdoings. With the last of the Estiennes and the younger Aldus the reign of great printers—great printers who were also great men of letters, for whom a Melancthon could act as corrector of the press, a Klein be content to serve fifty years, well satisfied if handed down to posterity as "vir candidus et in versibus facetus," comes seemingly to a close. Great names confront us still—Dutch Elzevirs, Scotch Foulis, English Baskerville, Parmese Bodoni, hardly less famous on his own account than for the contrast he presents to the average Italian biography of his day—each handing down the torch of progress from his own generation to the next, but hardly names, be the cause division of labour or spread of "sound commercial principles," so great as those that went before. With us who live in the age of steam of course all is changed once more—though we pride ourselves more on printing fast than on printing splendidly, on giving to the world a high average of books rather than a few here and there whose cost withholds them from the general buyer—doubtless we with all our appliances can turn out such work when we choose as even the virtuoso will admit the best of elder times could barely equal, certainly not excel. Yet though the old wooden presses are lumber now, the types that served from Pynson's days almost to our own no better than mere playthings, it is surely well at Commemoration festivals to linger rather on those things in which our predecessors were truly great than those in which we who stand upon their shoulders must necessarily surpass them.

INSUFFICIENT FOOTWAYS.——A correspondent writes to complain of "the very inadequate capacity of foot pavement from the crossing of Northumberland Street till it sweeps round in a direct line with Northumberland Avenue, just before reaching the elbow or turn of the avenue. The width is just that of the side porches of Temple Bar. What with the extension of the Railway Hotel, and all sorts of erections rising on or about this spot, those using this particular stretch of footway will be increased manifold. Even now it is a constant push and jostle all the day long, further increased by intending omnibus passengers, who find they can hail the conductors more readily at this spot. Any building constructions, as carried on at the present day, are so quickly completed that it seems before long the inconvenience will become fixed and permanent; also the entire length being so narrow, in wet weather the whole surface is thickly covered with liquid mud radiating from the wheels of passing vehicles of all kinds. Additional space should be gained from the ground at the back, the carriage way not being by any means of too ample dimensions even as it is now."

I.

THE second portion of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe's observations on Turkey (which appears in this month's Nineteenth Century), although written a few years after the Crimean War, is well worth studying at the present time, as embodying the views of a veteran statesman, who does not, like some of the partisan writers of the hour, evolve an imaginary Turkey out of his internal consciousness, but practically understands the subject concerning which he writes. Lord Stratford says that Turkey is by no means the stand-still, immoveable Power which she has been depicted, and that there has been a gradual departure from the principles of strict Islamism, and in the direction of Western civilisation, ever since the sixteenth century. The conclusion forced upon us by this valuable essay is that if Russia had possessed sufficient self-control at the present crisis to imitate the other Powers in letting Turkey alone, the pressure of surrounding European opinion would have produced a slow but steady amelioration of the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte, whereas now we have infinite bloodshed and misery, with the probable result that Muscovite aggrandisement will override Bulgarian freedom.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol writes a calm and sensible paper on the Ridsdale Judgment and its probable effects. The Ritualists, he thinks, do not take into sufficient consideration the "Protestantism" of the mass of the English laity, which is usually latent, but bursts out fiercely under strong persecution. The Eucharistic cope might, he thinks, if introduced with prudence, have become as familiar as the surplice. But Protestantism was aroused by the wilful manner in which the vestment movement was conducted, and so a good many clergy must strip certain fulgent garments off their backs, or seek refuge in the Roman Communion.—Mr. T. Brassey gives the first portion of his yacht voyage round the world, and Cardinal Manning finishes his "True Story of the Vatican Council." "Never," he says, "was any Council so numerous, nor were ever the dissentient voices relatively so few, and never did the Church come out from a great conflict more confirmed in its solidity or more tranquil in its internal peace." The zeal of converts is proverbial, and Dr. Manning's thorough-going advocacy of Vaticanism appears the less remarkable when we remember that only the other day he was a clergyman of the Church of England holding Evangelical views.—Mr. F. Harrison, who is a Positivist, holds forth at great length on "The Soul and Future Life." He does not believe in an immortality of personal consciousness, he thinks it is far nobler to live, as it were, by proxy, in the eternal effects of our thoughts and actions. Such a creed as this will never exercise any effectual control over human conduct; most of us are selfish, and if we can but convince ourselves that we shall cease individually to exist after death, we shall try and get as much enjoyment out of this life as we can, regardless of the claims of abstract Humanity in the future.—Some years ago, says Sir Julius Vogel, the late New Zealand Premier, the Whigs wanted to break up our Colonial Empire, and were ready to encourage our more important dependencies to start on their own account. Now the Tories are in office, and as public feeling is strongly in favour of keeping our colonies, Sir Julius recommends Federation, and that they should all be regarded as integral portions of the United Kingdom. The great practical difficulty, we think, in the way of any genuine federation arises from the insuperable fact that our colonies are so widely scattered. California, it may be said, is nearly three thousand miles distant from Maine, but then both States are situated on the same Continent, and all the intervening territory acknowledges the same flag, whereas oceans and continents lie between Great Britain and Australia. We see no objection to Sir Julius's proposed Board of Advice, but we suspect that this Board practically exists now in the shape of himself and other colonists who, though living in England, have the confidence of their countrymen abroad, and who are pretty sure to be consulted by a sensible Colonial Secretary before he undertakes any step of importance.

In the Contemporary Mr. Gladstone writes very temperately on the case of the Borneo pirates of 1849. It will be remembered that when the announcement was made of the cruelties inflicted by the Russians on the Yomud Tartars, Mr. Gladstone replied that our own dealings with savage or semi-savage races were not always very scrupulous, and as he was charged with vilifying the character of the late Sir James Brooke, he promised that he would investigate the whole matter. When Sir James Brooke was lord of Sarawak, the settlement was much harassed with pirates. He asked the aid of British ships of war, and the piratical tribes were caught like rats in a trap, the mouths of all the rivers being closed against escape. They were then mown down by grape-shot and musketry, at least 500 being killed, for whom, under the law then existing, head-money was paid. Mr. Gladstone points out that his object is to show the real nature of the acts the doers of which received from Parliament a triumphant acquittal, in order that we may be forbearing in our judgment upon other nations. There can be little doubt that if the victims had been white men the affair would have been stigmatised in this country as a barbarous massacre, but, somehow or other, the bulk of our countrymen (and our kinsmen, the Dutch and the Americans, are equally obtuse) refuse to regard dark-skinned men as true human beings. There can be no doubt that the Turkomans are much more like Russians than the Dyaks are like Englishmen, and hence, perhaps, the horror caused by the alleged atrocities in Tartary.—A lady writes a very fresh and interesting paper on Virgil, and another lady (Lady Verney) gives us some charming pictures of Holland. She is quite right in saying that the country (as distinguished from the towns), though quite as flat in Holland as in Belgium, is far more picturesque.—Mr. Wallace gives an interesting account of the state of parties in the Scottish Churches at the present time. There has been a general advance in the direction of Liberalism, especially among the laity, but Mr. Wallace maintains that the true essence of Calvinism (as distinguished from certain accidentals which are often associated with it) still holds sway; and he pays an eloquent tribute to a form of Christianity which has modelled the lives of two such notable peoples as the Scotch and the Dutch.

Mr. Goldwin Smith's essay in the Fortnightly on "The Defeat of the Liberal Party" is clever and clearly expressed, as is usual with this author, but he would act more persuasively on us if he were not so fond of attributing base motives to those from whom he differs. Mr. Smith knows as well as we do that there have been Whigs and Tories, under various appellations, ever since the world began, and although we do not wish to imitate his acrimony by stating the name (according to Dr. Johnson) of the first Whig, we cannot admit that one party has a monopoly of all the virtues. When Mr. Smith attacks Lord Beaconsfield and compares him to Bolingbroke, we are not so surprised, remembering the "social parasite" of "Lothair."—Mr. Chamberlain's account of the new political organisation which has been launched into existence at the Hardware Metropolis, the great focus of modern Radicalism, is far more calculated to disarm the hostility of opponents than Mr. Smith's acrid paragraphs. There can be little doubt that some such system as this for the selection of candidates for Parliament will become absolutely necessary when a redistribution of seats takes place on account of the great size of the new constituencies, and it can be adopted by Tories just as much as by Liberals; in fact, the Tories claim to be the inventors of it.—The annexation of the Transvaal has, says M. de Laveleye, caused keen chagrin among all Netherlanders, but he adds that the Boers will be the better for it, and reminds them that the French of Switzerland and Canada are happier than those who live in France.—There are other noteworthy papers in the Fortnightly, of which we can name but two—Professor Clifford's "Ethics of Belief," and the biography of the Duc de Broglie.

THE READER

"AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL RECOLLECTIONS OF SIR J. BOWRING," with Memoir by Lewin B. Bowring (H. S. King and Co.).—Already, we suspect, the once well-known figure of Sir John Bowring, LL.D., has become a shadowy form to most of our readers. A wondrous linguist among Englishmen forty years ago, the writer of at least one almost brilliant book about the East, the teterrima causa of a wretched Chinese war—is probably all that most of us could say offhand of the old pupil of Jeremy Bentham, the collaborateur of John Stuart Mill in the primal days of the Westminster Review, the somewhat doctrinaire associate of the first Freetraders, the representation of a stout old stock of West of England Dissenters and manufacturers. The "Recollections" which Mr. Lewin Bowring has edited with a memoir, which, though brief, is meritoriously free from the memoir-writer's besetting sin of hero-worship, were doubtlessly designed by their composer to be the nucleus of a connected volume of autobiography. Fate has left them disjecta membra, amusing enough, but sketchy and unconnected, roughly divisible into three great sections of "Work that I have done," "Places that I have visited," "Celebrities that I have known." And Sir John Bowring, however amusingly, and, we think, unconsciously self-important—boasting, for instance, that it was he who converted Belgium to Free Trade, who made the fortunes of Sylvan van der Weyer, who was the bosom friend of Louis Philippe till he offended him by saying des choses vertes, who buttonholed Thiers on the spot when there was some delay about signing a Convention, and set George Canning right about Russian intrigues in Greece, and all this while yet the outside world believed him simply a thriving merchant and expert in strange tongues occasionally employed abroad on missions rather financial than political—had more to see than most people of men and places in that long space from 1815 to 1860, of which so much is not yet among the histories we get by heart, while it has ceased to be among the histories we remember personally. From Spain—first visited in 1813 after a voyage described with a touch of Smollett-like humour—to the Russia of Alexander I. and Madame Krudener, the Egypt of Mehemet Ali, or, later on, the treaty ports of China and the dominions of the one Eastern potentate who could fairly match the doctor in his own linguistic field, the active pen is everywhere busy, jotting down politics alike and gossip, introducing us by turns to monarchs Constitutional and autocratic, to statesmen and diplomatists, to philosophers like Bentham, rarely emerging from his hermitage, though dutifully visited there with somewhat different objects by "canny" Brougham and the unselfish doctor, to soldiers of a just closed era like Mina, the guerrillero, or Dumouriez basking in his snug retreat at Turvile. Too slight in texture to add much to our historic knowledge, with once or twice a slip of memory, and oftener a printer's error, the "Recollections" still make up a volume eminently readable, to all at least who care for political and literary anecdote and gossip.

"Ancient Classics for English Readers—Aristotle," by Sir A. Grant (Blackwood and Sons).—To give to the unlearned reader not some such vague impression merely of the philosopher of Stageira as might be taken from a brief abstract of his greater works, a summary of the few known facts of his life, but a just idea of his true place in the history of thought, and all within the compass of some 200 pages, is palpably no easy task. It is one which Sir Alex. Grant has accomplished with the same thorough mastery of his subject which gives his "Xenophon" so high a place among the earlier volumes of this useful series. For many ages Aristotle was to the world almost another name for all philosophy. Not more profound and keen of intellect than radically and essentially systematic, it was he who first organised for good the entire structure of philosophic research, Physics, Morals, Metaphysics, with their accompanying train of Logic, Rhetoric, and Politics. A fragment only of his logical writings made up the entire groundwork of the philosophy of the schoolmen. An unwise reverence for his physical teachings was for centuries the great obstacle to modern science. Yet Aristotle, as Sir A. Grant points out, was hardly to be blamed for this. It was certainly not his fault if later followers forgot his rule to base all reasoning on fact, and turned his syllogism to purposes he never dreamed of. In any way he stands before us the completest form among the thinkers of all time, the direct precursor in the higher philosophy—with scarcely a step gained in all the time between—of the great Germans Kant and Hegel; childish in some things, passé in yet more, because long since worked into newer books, but not even yet in his more finished treatises a writer easily superseded or improved upon. Not the least interesting of Sir A. Grant's chapters is that indeed upon the evidence which ordinary conversation yields of our old debt to Aristotelian thought. "Matter," "form," "motive," "energy," "mean and extremes," "habit," "maxim," "principle," are but a few "Aristotelian fossils," once new words—and new words mean new ideas, too—for which, but for the Peripatetic the world might have waited long. As an introduction at once precise and clear to the life and writings of the most encyclopædic thinker (Hegel himself not excepted) of any age, Sir A. Grant's volume can scarcely be too highly praised.

"Treaty Relations of Russia and Turkey, 1774 to 1853" (Macmillan and Co.), by Professor Holland, D.C.L., or a survey of all the treaties between the two Powers from 1774 to the commencement of the Crimean War, with an appendix giving in tabular form the relations of these treaties to one another, with the full text of that of Kainardji, which begins the period, and that of Paris, 1856, which opens out a new departure, unfolds a chapter in the Eastern Question not always easily disentangled from its surroundings, but one that once set free cannot be too carefully analysed and studied. Treaties, of course, or rather truces after the fierce old rule which regarded war, not peace, as the normal state of relations between States, there were many before that treaty signed by the Grand Vizier "in the tent of Field-Marshal Count de Romanzow, near the village of Kutschouc-Kainardji, on the right bank of the Danube," as there were very many after it. But between these and it was this great difference, that whereas by it all former conventions were utterly abrogated and wiped out, it has itself been to all later treaties as the text of which they have been but commentaries or expansions. In Professor Holland's words, it began the system whose programme was (1) the gradual aggrandisement of Russia at the expense of Turkey, and (2) the special protectorate by Russia of the Christian vassals of the Porte, just as the Treaty of Paris—"the complete diplomatic success" of the Crimean War—began the system which has for its programme (1) the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, (2) the protectorate of the Christians, not by any single Power, but by the collective guarantee of all. European jealousy of Russian aims cut short the programme of Kainardji. Russia's "impatience with a merely co-ordinate position" has broken away in its turn from the programme of Paris, with what results the world has yet to see. By this careful abstract of transactions, too often hurried over as wanting "in life and picturesqueness," Dr. Holland has done the student no slight service.

From such dry bones of history as these we pass to picturesque history in excelsis, in Vol. V. of the Cabinet Edition of Mr. Kinglake's "Invasion of the Crimea" (Blackwood and Sons), with its superb tableaux of individual prowess at Balaclava and wondrous diagrams of the battle-path of one man here or fifteen men there. But Englishmen will always read such chapters with delight, nor care to ask too nice proportions from a brilliant colourist.

"Some Difficulties of Belief," or Sermons by the Rev. T. Teignmouth Shore (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), is a very good book indeed—direct and forcible as only sermons are that have been preached as these were from rough notes; subtle and penetrating in argument; instinct throughout with fullest sympathy with modern thought and wide acquaintance with modern controversies. The difficulties dealt with are not those of the unbeliever who does not even wish to be convinced, but of the earnest worshipper, perplexed, yet hardly daring to confess it—as beyond doubt an ever-increasing number are—in the attempt to reconcile God's ways in Scripture with human views of what is best and highest. Among the Sermons those on Answers to Prayer; on the Temptation—ascribed by Mr. Shore, as by Lange in his "Leben Jesu," to visible human agents; on the Atonement, with the subtly drawn distinction between vicarious punishment and vicarious suffering; and on religious selfishness or the doctrine of working out of our own salvation, may possibly be selected as the most striking. But all without exception bear the impress of genuine power and unmistakeable earnestness.

Among books of lesser mark we may notice a "Shilling Life of Handel," by Dr. Fowle (F. Pitman), a very fair resumé of the chief incidents in the great musician's life, based largely but not slavishly on the well-known "Life" by Schœlcher.—"Some Account of a New System of Elementary Teaching" (Pickering), by E. Barrington de Fonblanque, a somewhat interesting description of a system adopted in Mrs. Fielden's schools at Centre Vale, Todmorden, by which "sounds and motions" from a little signal held in the hand are used (to the great saving of time and breath), for directions in general discipline, in reading lessons and sewing—a system, however, only, we think, likely to answer with children very good or very small.—A useful but rather dry little "Tourist's Guide to the West Riding" (C. Stanford), by G. Phillips Bevan, and a "Tourist's Guide to Sussex" (Stanford), by G. F. Chambers, rather nicely planned for visits to the chief watering places first, and then, from east to west, through the more central districts afterwards, and with a general introduction—the dreariest thing in guide-books usually—of really considerable interest and conciseness.

AN UNFASHIONABLE HOLIDAY

THERE exists a venerable adage to the effect that a certain nameless personage is not quite so black as he is generally painted, and we are instinctively reminded of the charitable proverb as we slowly and laboriously make our way through the vast and surging mass of artisan life which, during the evening of the first Friday in July, fills the broad and spacious thoroughfare—the Champs Elysées of East London—reaching from Whitechapel Church to the grand old forest, whose mossy dells and sylvan glades have so recently become rescued from the grasp of the spoiler, and dedicated for ever to the recreation and enjoyment of the toiling myriads in the dusty and smoke-dried city. We look around in vain for indications of the squalid poverty and heart-rending misery with which we are instinctively accustomed to associate our ideas of Bethnal Green, Spitalfields, and other densely populated districts which have so long formed the favourite hunting grounds of the lovers of sensational effect. There are congregated many of the labouring poor, men and women in whose careworn and pallid features may be read the dismal story of ceaseless struggles to keep the wolf from the door; but they form a small, very small minority of the enormous crowd, the numbers of which have been variously estimated at from two hundred thousand to three hundred and fifty thousand, patiently awaiting the return of the "Fairlop boats" from the "merry greenwood," where the joyous festivities initiated by good old Daniel Day have been religiously kept up with undiminished vigour, although the famous oak which gave its name to the popular holiday has long since become a thing of the past. The gathering is essentially one of a working-class character, and the domestic tastes of the London artisans are unmistakably shown in the frequency with which they are found accompanied by their wives and families. Occasionally there is to be seen some rough horseplay, accompanied by language more remarkable for emphasis than for taste or politeness, but, in nine cases out of ten, the culprits are half-tamed savages dwelling in the narrow, close, and unsavoury courts which yet bid sullen defiance to the labours of social and sanitary reformers, and remain, as of old, the foul abiding places of shameless immorality and skulking crime. Such incidents, however, are common to all large street gatherings, and the wonder is, not that they are noticeable during the Fairlop Fair evening, but that they are not more general, considering the comparative paucity of police constables entrusted with the almost sinecure duty of preserving order.

True, the public-houses are doing a roaring trade, for walking about in a dense crowd on a July evening is thirsty work; yet there is very little drunkenness, and still less disorderly conduct. Even the bands of open-air preachers stationed at various points of the route to Bow and Stratford find plenty of listeners, and rarely hear a word of derision or insult. In fact, the London artisan is naturally one of the most peaceable and orderly of mortals, if left to himself. In 1848 so alarmed were a few of the authorities at the rumoured revolutionary tendencies of the East-enders that there was some talk of attempting to prohibit the popular July festival. Fortunately wiser counsels prevailed, and when the dreaded day arrived it was discovered that the apprehensions entertained by the panic-stricken guardians of the public peace were entirely groundless. It is very rarely that the English artisan permits politics to interfere with his holidays, as the well-known Democratic leader, Ernest Jones, discovered, to his great mortification, when he invited the metropolitan workmen to assemble "in thousands" in the neighbourhood of the newly-formed Victoria Park on the Easter Monday of the same year. Instead of flocking to the meeting, the artisans wisely stayed away, and the police and soldiery in attendance were compelled to beguile the "weariness of waiting" by dancing to the dulcet strains of barrel organs or slicing lettuces with their glittering cutlasses. It is while waiting for the return of the three-masted boats, mounted on wheels, from Hainault Forest, that the London workman may be seen exactly as he is. In the Whitechapel Road he stands on his own ground, and amid his own class. He is not regarded as an interloper, as is sometimes the case in more aristocratic regions, but is as much at home as if he were sitting in his own humble room.

Perhaps it may be a sense of this which causes him to take his pleasures so soberly. He gazes dreamily at the coloured fires and limelights which herald the return of the boats, or at the hundreds of vehicles which, half-hidden by masses of leafy boughs ruthlessly plucked from the forest trees, dash madly through the street as if the safety of the excited occupants depended on the speed of their horses. The scene is to him a kind of stage spectacle, got up for his especial amusement, and he enjoys it as he would a stirring melo-drama at the Pavilion or East London theatres, the exteriors of which are brilliantly illuminated, as though the managers—unlike their West End brethren—rejoiced in an event which tended to thin their audiences. If his wife and little ones are pleased, he is happy, and when the boats have passed by, the stores of red and blue fire exhausted, and the cheering at an end, he trudges merrily homeward, as if there were no necessity for him to be up and doing at six o'clock on the following morning. He may stop a few moments during the homeward journey to light his pipe, but with his wife and children at his side the public-house has no charms for him, and thus it is that long before the church clocks have chimed the first hour of the new-born day, the streets have become deserted and quiet, revealing to the belated wayfarer not the faintest trace of the popular, albeit unfashionable holiday.

NORTH AND SOUTH

M. d'Assier, in a very interesting paper, in the on the "Evolution of the Human Race," remarks that nearly all great scientific Frenchmen have come from Northern France. This he deems only part of the larger fact (?) that science has always thriven far more in Central and Northern than in Southern Europe: "the sonorous languages of the South do not lend themselves well to scientific precision." He is perhaps right in saying that Spain never produced a great scientific discoverer; but surely "every schoolboy" can name plenty of great Italian scientists, from Galileo to Galvani and from him to Father Secchi. As to his own country, M. d'Assier is probably correct. The scientists of Southern France have been comparatively few and ineffectual. Fermat, of Toulouse, for instance, did next to nothing, when just a little more energy would have enabled him to do great things. He got a glimpse of the calculus some years before Newton and Leibnitz discovered it. He got it in precisely the same way, by applying Descartes' method to infinitesimal analysis. But having enunciated what is called Fermat's theorem, he stopped there, whereas they pushed on. M. d'Assier traces this lower development of the scientific mind in Southern France mainly to religious persecution. In spite of the proverb about the blood of martyrs, it is possible to stamp out a religion; and, in like manner, though a little blood-letting may give a fillip to intellectual energy, too much of it will exhaust and prostrate. First, then, there was the Albigensian war, the sufferers in which were vastly more enlightened than their persecutors, seeing that none would become a sectary unless he gave some thought to the subject. Just, therefore, as Captain Galton notes that the monastic system selected for sterility most of the gentlest and many of the noblest natures in Europe, leaving the race to be mainly kept up by the coarser and more savage, so the exterminating of the Albigenses was a true anti-intellectual selection.

Next came the religious persecutions of the sixteenth century, which, we are told, raged most fiercely in the South. In Toulouse alone 4,000 Protestants were massacred—a jubilee festival, abolished only ten years ago, commemorated the fact. Then followed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and in both cases the élite of the population was cut off; for Protestantism in France began from above, not, as in Germany, and partly in England, from below. The masses (except in a few districts) were always Romanist; the strength of the Reformation lay in the small noblesse and their dependents. These, the most intellectual part of the nation, were decimated over and over again, and the work was (says M. d'Assier) far more thoroughly done in the South than in the North. This we take leave to doubt. There was plenty of Protestantism among the Norman "squires," indeed, at one time, when Montgomery and D'Aubigny and Colombières held the field, it seemed as if the cause would succeed in the North. The difference was that there grew up in the North no large Protestant population like that which existed (and still exists) in the South; the "squires," both Northern and Southern, were killed off or converted, but the descendants of the Camisards are Protestants still. M. d'Assier's fact, which we do not dispute, we partly account for from difference of race. If race is, as he says, "to be put out of the question in a homogeneous (?) country like France," Brittany, where there has scarcely ever been any religious persecution, because nearly every one has always thought alike, should be the most scientific province of France, which it certainly is not. France as a whole has lost fearfully by religious persecutions; had not so much clear-headed, sober-minded energy been cut off or driven abroad, the Reign of Terror would have been impossible; but we do not see that (except in the Albigensian crusade) the South suffered so much more than the North as to warrant M. d'Assier's conclusion. The sack of St. Lô and the religious sieges of Rouen may be set against the massacre of Toulouse.

FOREIGN EXPLORATIONS OF AFRICA

We pride ourselves, and justly, on English explorations, and in that active period of African Exploration which extends over the last forty years, it may be fairly said that we have greater achievements and more legitimate results to show than any other nation. But the English public are by no means equally well acquainted with what has been done by foreign explorers in the same vast field. There have been active foreign explorers contemporary with our own great travellers, and as a matter of fact England has been anticipated by several foreign nations in some most important tracts of exploration. Many of Livingstone's discoveries on the Zambesi and the Congo had been anticipated by the Portuguese. The Dutch from the Cape, and the French from Senegambia, had penetrated far into the Continent. The German Hornemann and the French Mollien attempted the same enterprise as Mungo Park, the greatest of all the travellers of his time. From their vantage ground of Algeria and Senegal the French have sent repeated expeditions into the great desert of Sahara which forms the limits of their possessions. The expedition of Gerhard Rohlfs, in the eastern part known as the Libyan Desert, in 1873-4, yielded very remarkable results. The five years' journey of Dr. Nachtigal in the African interior has made him as famous in Prussia as Livingstone. Only two explorers have ever penetrated Africa from north to south. One of these is Sir Samuel Baker, with whose exploits we are all acquainted; the other is Dr. Schweinfurth, a Russ by birth, but educated in Germany, who was enabled by the Humboldt Institution to penetrate into the heart of Africa. The Italian Expedition of the Marquis Antinori's was a comparative failure. Though Bruce determined the sources of the Blue Nile, yet the Frenchmen Lefebvre and Lejean settled decisively the geography of the region. Our own English missionaries have done much, and the efforts which have been made and still are being made by the great English Missionary Societies, and more especially by the Central African Mission promoted by our Universities. Roman Catholic Missions were established at Khartoum, Gondoroko, and St. Croix, more especially with a view to check the slave trade, but they have been unsuccessful. The German missionaries, Rebman and Krapf, have rediscovered Ptolemy's Mountains of the Moon, "the probable site of the sources of the Nile." Kiepert's map of 1874 is by far the best, and may now, mainly through the labours of Stanley and Cameron, receive considerable additions. How great the progress has been will be seen by contrasting it with Carl Ritter's map of 1822 in his "Comparative Geography." The Austrian Marno in 1872, after reaching the South of Abyssinia, made a reconnaissance to the left of the White Nile, which is perhaps the best opening for further discoveries in Equatorial Africa. But our own Livingstone stands head and shoulders above the travellers of all nations, who has traversed the Continent from east to west and from south to north.

The present King of the Belgians may justly be accredited with having given the greatest possible impetus to the cause of African exploration. In the autumn of last year he assembled an International Conference of the geographers of all nations for the purpose of considering the African problem. Leopold II. considered that by a combination of national and individual efforts the region of Central Africa, which at the commencement of the present century was simply a blank on the map, might be civilised and Christianised. The King's speech on this occasion was one of the happiest regal addresses on record, and he expressed a hope that Brussels would become the headquarters of the civilising movement. Belgium has no Geographical Society like our own, but if it attains this distinction no Geographical Society will have higher eminence and honour. To this Conference Germany sent her great travellers, Nachtigal, Rohlfs, and Schweinfurth. France sent among others its distinguished African traveller, Duveyrier; Russia, M. P. De Semenow, the Vice-president of the Geographical Society of St. Petersburg. We give the list of English members: Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Rutherford Alcock, Sir Henry Rawlinson, Sir Leopold Heath, Lieut.-Col. J. A. Grant, Commander Cameron, Mr. W. Mackinnon, Sir T. Fowell Buxton, Sir J. Kennaway, Sir Harry Verney. This International Congress seems to have met on the basis that by the public law of Europe, as embodied at the Congresses of Vienna and Verona, the traffic for negroes in Africa is condemned. It is international action based upon international opinion. The proceedings of the Conference have been edited by one of the members, M. Emile Banning, and have been published in French and English. The great practical object aimed at—the desideratum of all travellers and geographers—is the establishment of depôts or stations where explorers may be sure of finding a resting-place, and fresh stores, and fresh men. The plan submitted by Sir Henry Rawlinson was that there should be a continuous line of stations between the east and west coasts south of the Equator. Such "stations" would have saved many a life, and facilitated many an expedition. Our own Royal Geographical Society is raising a Special African Fund, thoroughly in harmony with the purpose of the Brussels Congress. It must be said to the credit of the Church Missionary Society that in various places they have established stations or depôts which may serve as a nucleus for a future Christian community, and appear to have been more fortunate than the Roman Catholic missionaries. Some English diplomatic posts have the same character, and the English are allowed to have led the way, although it is hoped that the new stations will be on a larger scale. Those stations are to be called "international," and travellers will be received as public guests of the States of Europe. It is supposed that a population of natives will gather round the stations just as towns have grown up beneath the shadow of castle or cathedral. The place in each case is to be a relief station, a depôt, and a scientific observatory. It is hoped that the Governor will be able to devise measures to resist the slave trade. Each place is to be the basis of operations into the interior—the thick end of the telescope, which will be drawn out to the furthest possible extremity. All is intended for a system of thorough exploration of the African Continent. Extraordinary efforts are now being made in different European countries, and Englishmen will have to look to their laurels. Committees are actually formed in Germany, Austria, Spain, and the Netherlands. They are being formed in France, Italy, Switzerland, Portugual, and, we believe, the United States. All these conform to the programme, and put themselves into relationship with the International Congress. It is quite as well that so vast an undertaking as the reformation of a Continent should be a European rather than a national business. At the present moment France has an expedition on the Ogowé, a river which has only been discovered within the last few years, and Germany is organising one on the coast of Loango. The present state of the matter is that there remains about one-quarter of the Continent of Africa to be examined and described. It is, perhaps, not too much to hope that there are men now living who may survive to see a comparative completion of the exploration of Africa. England will doubtless retain her foremost place in this great work, but happily we may now expect to see her labours more and more shared by America and the nations of the Continent.

New Music

Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co.——Two of the brightest and best ballads which F. H. Cowen has ever composed are "Ay or No?" published in two keys for tenor and baritone, and "Steering," for a mezzo-soprano. The pleasing words of the former are by W. J. Stewart; of the latter by F. G. W. Quite the reverse are the commonplace words and music of a ballad "My Boyhood's Dream," by Dr. Carpenter and J. L. Hatton, a reproach which can seldom be cast at these popular collaborateurs.—Quaint and amusing is a little poem by L. Thornton, entitled "The Cuckoo's Concert," but it failed to inspire H. P. Danks with aught but a very dull melody.—Fairly good in their way are two transcriptions for the pianoforte, by F. Lemoine, of a brace of popular ballads of bygone days; the one "Far Away," by Miss Lindsay, the other, "Thy Voice is Near," by W. T. Wrighton.—A very interesting and useful little manual for the musical student is "C. Czerny's Letters to a Young Lady on the Art of Playing the Pianoforte." It may with advantage be studied by all beginners and many advanced students. Commencing with the first rudiments of the pianoforte he passes on progressively through ten letters until he arrives at "Extemporaneous Performance." Excellent advice and many valuable suggestions for the public as well as private executant will be found in this work.

Messrs. Witt and Co.——Tenors with small but sympathetic voices may warble most successfully three love songs by F. Sieber, either with their native German words or with the ably translated English version by J. Oxenford. Most affectionate of the three is "The Bird's Lay" ("Ein Vöglein Sang"). Next comes "Before Me Float'st Thou" ("Du Schewbst nur Vor"), and least tender of the three is "The Valley" ("Blühendes Thal"), to ordinary taste the prettiest of the group.—L. Samson has set to a tuneful melody Byron's charming poem "Know'st Thou the Land;" "Mignon" is the title of this song.—Foremost amongst modern German composers is Heinrich Hofmann, from whom come "Four Two Part Songs," entitled respectively "Wake! 'Tis Morning," "The Little Sweetheart," "The Snowflakes," and "When o'er the Sea," a group of brief but so graceful compositions that the series may be sung consecutively without fear of tedium or monotony; these duets are for two soprani; the pleasing words are by Lewis Novra.—"The Hungarian Maiden" is a song of no ordinary merit, for a soprano of medium compass; words and music by Novra and Hofmann.—Both for study and execution a "Grand Funeral March," composed for the orchestra by H. Hofmann, and ably arranged by the composer as a pianoforte duet, may be highly commended.—Although not very easy to learn, "Prairie Pictures," three pianoforte duets on original Russian melodies by H. Hofmann, will repay the trouble of studying them.—By the above-named composer are nine graceful morceaux for the pianoforte, published under the collective title of "Nachklange" (Op. 37).—Of a more sketchy and facile description, but the work of a true musician, are "Nine Pianoforte Pieces," by K. Mahlberg (Op. 11). The system adopted by some modern composers of publishing a suite of pieces in one number has its advantages for those amateurs who cannot play from memory, if only as giving them a variety to chose from in a small space.—H. Fliege, who composes very neat and correct pianoforte pieces, well adapted for schools, sends us four, the most tuneful of which is "Mazurka" ("Auf zum Tanzen"), certain to be the favourite of the series—second to which will be "Lorely."—In "The Happiest Moment" and "Abendständchen" there is nothing either novel or striking.

Messrs. Wood and Co.——The words are far better than the music of a "Mischievous Love," a lively song for a mezzo-soprano, written and composed by R. Harvey.—There is a fair amount of originality both in the poetry and music of a tenor song, "Guessing," written and composed by Messrs. J. Endersohn and W. C. Levey, compass from D below the lines to E on the fourth space.

Mr. J. H. Parker, in his book on the "Aqueducts of Rome," gives us some facts which may well put modern municipalities, not to speak of Governments, to the blush. The exact quantity of water daily poured into Rome in Trajan's time is known from careful estimates of Frontinus, the head Government surveyor and engineer. It amounted to 24,805 quinaries, a section of which amount would be just upon 120 square feet; i.e., in Mr. Parker's words, "we can form some notion of the vast quantity, if we picture to ourselves a stream twenty feet wide by six deep constantly running in at a fall six times as rapid as that of the Thames." It is calculated that, when Trajan's and the Aurelian aqueducts were finished, the daily supply was quite 332¼ millions of gallons; i.e., at least 332 gallons per head, for the population of old Rome probably never exceeded a million. Nowadays forty gallons per head per day are thought ample, and by many excessive; these forty including, of course, all that is used in manufactures, in street-cleansing, sewer-flushing, &c. The site of old Rome was notably unhealthy, and there was much over-crowding; yet after the chief aqueducts were made, no city of antiquity was so free from epidemics. The contrast in this respect is great between Imperial Rome, with its copious water-supply, and the Rome of the Commonwealth, which, till the blind Censor Appius made his first conduit, was supplied only from wells and from the river. Another point to which Mr. Parker calls attention is the care with which the best water (such as the Marcian, now lately brought into use again) was kept wholly for drinking purposes, while the muddier and less pure (such as the Anio Vetus, and Novus) was used for street and sewer flushing, for the baths, and for scenic representations. In many of our coast towns sea-water is now used for street-watering. But there are many inland towns which might be fairly supplied with pure drinking water if the good water was wholly reserved for domestic use. Stored rain-water would do for many purposes except for cooking and drinking; and that we ought to store our rain-water we have been once more reminded in a way which has cost us more than the making of many reservoirs and the adjusting of many water-claims.

THE WAR IN THE EAST—WITH THE RUSSIANS: ACROSS THE DANUBE

FOREIGN

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The Russians have effected a second crossing of the Danube, are now fairly established in Bulgaria, and have already begun the formation of the promised Bulgarian "constitution." To resume our chronicle of events. Very early on the morning of the 27th ult., a Russian corps de armée, under General Dragomiroff, crossed in boats, protected by iron shields, at Simnitza, and, notwithstanding some sharp firing from the Turkish batteries, effected a landing by daybreak, when no fewer than 208 boats had made the passage. The Turkish troops then retired from their position at Sistova, which was immediately occupied by the Russians, the Grand Duke Nicholas crossed over with reinforcements, and a proclamation from the Czar was at once published to the Bulgarians. In this the Czar announces the entrance of his army into their territory—where it has already several times fought for the sake of the Christians. After alluding to Russia's sympathy with her co-religionists in the Balkan Peninsula, he states that he has now confided to his troops under his brother Nicholas the mission of securing the "sacred rights" of the Bulgarian nation. "Henceforward the Russian arms will protect every Christian against all violence, no attack will be made with impunity upon his person or his property by any one, and every crime will be followed by a fitting punishment." Next comes a "salutary warning" to the Mussulmans of Bulgaria, who are reminded of the recent atrocities, but are told that "all will not be held responsible for the crimes of a few." Regular and impartial punishment is to be dealt out to those criminals who have remained unpunished, but as for the others they are recommended to "acknowledge the justice of God, bow to His will, submit their legitimate needs to the Russian authorities, and become peaceful members of society." "Your existence, and your property, the lives and honour of your families will be sacred before us Christians." The Bulgarians are then told that as the Russians advance the Turkish power will be replaced by "regular organisations in which the Bulgarians will be summoned to take an active part, and new Bulgarian legions will be formed in order to maintain order and security." According to the Russians the crossing was effected with a loss of only 200 men. The Turks, however, claim to have slaughtered 4,000.

On the 28th ult. the Czar himself crossed over to Sistova, where he was received with the utmost enthusiasm by the Christians. His Majesty had been previously watching the bombardment of Nicopolis, where the Turks appear to have successfully prevented a third Russian crossing. Having established themselves at Sistova, the Russians at once began to complete the construction of a pontoon bridge, and this, notwithstanding a violent gale, and the interference of a monitor, was ready for service by Sunday, when a large force was enabled to cross, and a general move forward was made. The statements concerning the fighting during the march into the interior are somewhat confused and contradictory. The Turks report great victories and "carnage" at Biela, a town a little south-west of Sistova, but the Russians are reported to have penetrated to Tirnova, so that the combats at Biela were probably only carried on to keep Abd-ul-Kerim and his troops well occupied. As each town has been taken by the Russians a municipal administration is at once organised, and Matchin and Sistova are now under Christian magistrates, elected by the inhabitants from among their own citizens, and all able-bodied Bulgarians have been summoned to enrol themselves in the Bulgarian legion. Tirnova, the historic capital of the Bulgarian Czars, is to be the head-quarters of the Provisional Government of Bulgaria, of which Prince Tcherkassi has been appointed the head.

Tirnova possesses several noteworthy advantages, as from thence branch off the roads to the important Shipka Pass and the Selimno Gorge, while the city forms a central point for the southward advance of the Russian troops. The prospects of the passage of the Balkans seems now far better for the Russians than a week ago, as the Turks will probably be unable to defend the long line of passes any better than they have protected the shores of the Danube; while the Russians will be befriended by the Heyducs, those hardy mountaineers into whose retreats the Turks have never ventured, and who alone are acquainted with various secret passes by which the invaders could benefit. To return to the Danube. Nicopolis and Rustchuk have been laid in ruins by the continued bombardment, and all the consuls and authorities at the latter place have removed to Varna, whither all the railway rolling stock has been also transferred. In the Dobrudscha the whole army under General Zimmerman has now crossed over, and a general advance towards the Wall of Trajan and Kustendjie may daily be expected.

As for the Turks, the success of the Russians and the rapidity with which they have thrown a large army into Bulgaria, occupied some of the principal points, and possessed themselves of almost the whole territory except the Quadrilateral, has been received by the passive Osmanli with even more than his usual apathy. Abd-ul-Kerim reported, however, that he intended to attack the Russians at Biela, which he certainly seems to have done, but apparently with no beneficial result. The Sultan on learning the news is said to have flown into a rage and nearly to have quarrelled with Redif Pasha; and this perhaps had something to do with his departure with reinforcements for Shumla—a step looked upon with great joy by the Constantinopolitans.

In ASIA the Turks continue to be highly successful, and the Russian retreat is even admitted by the Russian despatches. On the 25th ult. there was a great battle at Zewin, in which General Melikoff, who wished to prevent Mouktar Pasha from going to the relief of Kars, lost a very large number of men (he admits 850 disabled), and apparently suffered a very severe defeat, so that according to Turkish accounts communication has been restored with the besieged city, Mouktar Pasha being encamped at less than a dozen miles distant. The Russian troops round Batoum also have been driven back by Dervish Pasha, and General Oklopochio has now ensconced himself near Mukhaelstaule. General Tergukassoff also, who has been gradually retreating for some time past, was attacked, on Monday, at Karakilissa, and completely routed, the Turks capturing large stores of provisions and ammunition. In Abchasia the Turks are holding their ground and repulsing the Russian attacks, but they make no headway with the insurrection, which may fairly be considered suppressed. The checks the Russians have received in Asia have compelled them to send home for reinforcements, which are being sent, but are not expected to arrive for some weeks, during which time the Turks may manage to secure valuable successes. The Turkish fleet in the Black Sea is keeping very quiet, its sole exploit being a boat attack upon the Cossacks in the look-out towers on the Sulina mouths of the Danube. The Porte has issued another Circular to the Powers, complaining that the retreating Russians are committing great cruelties upon the Mussulmans. Thus the inhabitants of the villages of Djerza and Hadji-Tchefllik having been despoiled of all they possessed were sent in a state of complete nudity to join their compatriots at Kars. At Constantinople the Parliament has been dismissed for the Session.

To return to Europe, ROUMANIA is becoming more and more anxious to join the fray, and it is said that 2,000 Roumanians have already crossed the Danube. From MONTENEGRO there is no news of importance, but in SERVIA Prince Milan has opened the Skuptchina at Kragujevatz with a speech, which after alluding to recent events, and to his visit to the Czar at Plojesti, asked the Deputies to give preference to the voting of the estimates. "Although Servia is at present at peace," concluded the Prince, "events are developing around us of so great importance that the country's welfare imposes circumspection upon us, and a false step at so decisive a moment might ruin our fair prospects."

FRANCE.——An Order of the Day addressed to the troops by Marshal MacMahon after the review on Sunday has called forth considerable discussion owing to its possessing a political rather than a military tenour. After complimenting the troops, the Marshal wrote: "Yes, you understand your duties; you feel that the country has entrusted to you the protection of its dearest interests. In any event I count on you to defend them. You will, I am certain, aid me to maintain the respect and authority of the law in the exercise of the mission which has been confided to me, and which I shall accomplish in its entirety." This last phrase is interpreted to mean that the Marshal intends to remain at the head of affairs until 1880, despite any hostile majority which the country may choose to send to Versailles, while the Conservatives and the Bonapartists in particular construe the first portion of the document into a tacit threat to employ force of arms if necessary to prevent the triumph of the Radicals. "Blows will fall on you, citizens, like hail if you do not march straight. . . . he has appealed to bayonets, and everything is going to be as it should be," triumphantly exclaims the Pays—which, by the way, as every good Bonapartist should, piques itself on being a staunch advocate of the right of the people to choose their own rulers. By the Republicans the Marshal's utterances are warmly condemned, and even the sober Débats avows its conviction that the Marshal was "evilly inspired." This, indeed, is the opinion of most impartial people, who equally condemn a Circular of the Minister of the Interior to the Prefects concerning the elections. In this M. Fourtou tells again the old story of the President having overturned the Radical intrigues on May 16th, and having appealed to the Conservatives, and requests the Provincial officials to inform the electors that Marshal MacMahon, acting "in the regular exercise of his Constitutional rights," has saved France from a great danger, and that the Marshal and the Conservatives intend to respect all existing Constitutions under the law which makes the Constitution unrevisable until 1880. The Minister then dealing with "official candidates" declares that the Government has the right to point out to the electors "the candidates who support and those who oppose its policy," and concludes with a warning to all functionaries that the Government cannot permit any to be hostile to it, and those who venture to display any opposition may expect neither "toleration nor indulgence."

The prospects of the elections are engrossing public attention, but owing to the repressive measures adopted by the Duc de Broglie, little is heard just now from the Republicans, who nevertheless profess themselves eminently confident of the success of the 400. The very frank language of the Marshal and his Ministers, however, which implies that if the 400 are elected no material change is to be expected, the broad hints that another dissolution will simply be voted, and the covert threat in the Marshal's order of the day are not unlikely to have a very powerful effect on the country voter, who is, above all, anxious for peace and commercial prosperity, and has an intense horror of civil war. Moreover, notwithstanding that the Bien Public has been fined for republishing a telegram from an English paper that Mgr. Guibert had come to Paris upon a political mission from the Pope, there is little doubt that if there is no direct alliance, there is a very good understanding between the Marshal and the Clerical party, whose influence in electoral matters is in no way to be despised.

Paris is very hot, the thermometer during the review on Sunday standing at 92 in the shade. The review passed off very successfully, but there were comparatively few of the artisan class present, a fact probably owing to the exhortations of the Radical leaders to their followers that they should abstain from any hostile demonstration towards the Marshal. As it was the review took place amid absolute silence. There has been one first representation this week—Les Deux Carnets, a comedy by Madame Figuier at the Cluny, a sort of second edition of the Pink Dominoes, and Marivaux's Jeu de l'Amour et du Hasard has been revived at the Français.—A repetition of the Vanguard disaster has occurred in France—the frigate Reine Blanche having been run down by the spur of the ironclad Heroine off the Hyères Isles.

GERMANY.——Prince Bismarck has paid another unexpected visit to Berlin. Our Ambassador has suddenly returned thither before his holiday is over, and consequently there have been rumours of intervention in the Eastern Question. These rumours have been strengthed by the report that the exportation of horses is again to be prohibited. This, again, is construed into a foreshadowing of complications with France owing to the Marshal's asserted Clerical affinities.

The Emperor is still in Kissingen, and the Cologne Gazette gives the following account of his daily life:—He rises at 6 or 6.30, appears on the promenade about 8, drinks the water at the prescribed intervals till 9.30, then breakfasts, and every other day also takes a bath between 10.30 and 11.30. During the morning he receives civil and military reports; dines about 4, generally inviting company; and then receives a report on foreign affairs, a Cabinet courier arriving every morning, and the telegraph office being open night and day. If an interval remains before the theatre the Emperor takes an airing, and about 7.30 appears on the promenade, then attends the play, next takes tea, and about 10.45 retires to his narrow iron bedstead, unless business detains him till 11 or 11.30.

UNITED STATES.——President Hayes has been visiting Boston, where he has had an enthusiastic reception, being invested at Harvard University with the honorary degree of LL.D.—The British rifle team which is to compete with the Americans at Creedmoor for the Centennial trophy will consist of ten members and the captain, Sir Henry St. John Halford.—Several severe tornadoes prevailed throughout the States on Saturday and Sunday. Great damage has been done, a train was overturned, and in Ohio and Indiana sixteen persons were killed.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The British fleet has again been ordered to its last year's quarters in BESIKA BAY—a proceeding which caused the Paris Bourse to fall, excited some comment in Berlin, and considerable dissatisfaction at Bucharest.—From AUSTRIA we hear that the Czar's proclamation to the Bulgarians is eyed unfavourably owing to the Czar assuming to himself the protectorship of the Christians, which hitherto has been shared by the Powers. The De Trouville trial has resulted in a verdict of guilty, and the prisoner was condemned to death. He has naturally appealed to the higher courts.—TUNIS has sent mules, cattle, and money to the Porte, and the French Consul asking for explanations, the Bey, who had given his promise to remain neutral, replied that the presents were the result of popular sympathy with the Sultan.—From INDIA the only news is that the Ameer of Afghanistan is behaving strangely, having ordered all his subjects in the British service to resign their posts. Cabul and Peshawur also are closed against British traders. The Maharajah of Cashmere has taken up 60,000*l.* of the new Government Loan, Puttiala 20,000*l.*, and Jheend and Nabha 10,000*l.* each.—Mr. Rainford, an English subject, who was accused of resisting and insulting the Carabineers at Taormina (SICILY), when arbitrarily arrested by them last September, has been tried. The presiding magistrate, admitting "extenuating circumstances," sentenced him to pay a fine of 100 francs and costs.—In ITALY the Antonelli will case is attracting considerable interest. The whole of the property is now claimed by an asserted daughter of the Cardinal, the Countess Lauretta Lamberlini.

THE COURT

THE QUEEN paid a short visit to town on Saturday. Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice came up in the afternoon, visited the Duchess of Cambridge, called on the Emperor and Empress of Brazil to take leave of their Majesties, and returned to Windsor in time for dinner, at which they were joined by Prince and Princess Christian and the Dean of Windsor. Next morning, the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended service in the private chapel, and in the evening the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, Col. and Miss Violet Lindsay, and Major-General Ponsonby dined with Her Majesty. On Monday the Queen gave a dinner-party, the Belgian Minister and Baroness Solvyns, the Portuguese Minister and Madame D'Antas, the Marquis and Marchioness of Bute, and the Earl and Countess of Listowel being the chief guests. During dinner the Grenadier Guards band played in the quadrangle. On Tuesday Her Majesty gave an audience to Lord Salisbury, and received Sayynd Yakub Khan Turah, envoy from the Amir of Kashgar, Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold also being present at his reception. On Wednesday the Count and Countess of Paris dined with Her Majesty. The Queen will leave for the Isle of Wight about the 16th inst.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have been spending a few days at Sandringham, the present visit being instead of their usual one at Easter, when this year the Prince was just starting for the Continent, and the Princess had already left. The Prince and Princess and their children arrived on Saturday, and on Sunday attended morning service at St. Mary Magdalene's. They would return to town yesterday (Friday) to be present at the second State Concert at Buckingham Palace, which was fixed for last night. To-day (Saturday) the Princess will give away the prizes to the successful students of the schools of the Savoy Precincts at Burlington House. Next Saturday the Prince and Princess go to Wantage to unveil a statue of King Alfred, presented to the town by Col. Lindsay. Wantage was the King's birthplace, and the statue, which has been executed by Count Gleichen, and is of marble on a granite pedestal, is erected on the former site of the Town Hall in the market place. The Prince and Princess will stay with Col. and Mrs. Lindsay at Lockinge House, and will remain until the following Monday.—Princess Victoria, second daughter of the Prince and Princess of Wales, was nine years old yesterday (Friday).

The Princess Louise visited Tunbridge Wells on Saturday, and laid the memorial stone of the Friendly Societies' Hall now being built in the Camden Road.—The Duke of Connaught has been yachting in the Clyde with Lord Clanmorris, and has returned to Dublin.

The Emperor and Empress of Brazil are now in Scotland. Before leaving London their Majesties on Saturday paid and received numerous farewell visits, while the Emperor also inspected the Government Works at Wormwood Scrubs, the Pentonville Prison, Messrs. Trübner's printing establishment, and went to the Horticultural Gardens. In the evening their Majesties dined with Lady Holland. Early on Sunday morning they left for Edinburgh, where they arrived by 4 P.M., and spent the evening driving about the city. Monday was occupied in visiting the various sights of Edinburgh, and going to Melrose and Abbotsford, and next day their Majesties left for Inverness, the Emperor going on first to Dundee to see the great bridge, and then rejoining his wife at Perth. From Inverness they return by a different way to Glasgow, and thence go to Ireland for a few days, when they will visit Belfast and Killarney, and take Cork and Dublin on their road back.—The King of Hanover and his daughter, Princess Frederica, have gone to Biarritz for a few weeks.

CHURCH NEWS

CONVOCATION.——Both Houses of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury met on Tuesday, when "The Priest in Absolution" was the subject principally dealt with. On the motion of the Primate the Upper House adopted a resolution calling the attention of the Lower House to the declaration on the subject agreed to by a Committee of the whole House in July, 1873. In the Lower House a gravamen was presented by Prebendary Gibbs, praying that steps might be taken to remove the scandal which had arisen out of the discussion and reading of, extracts from the book in the House of Lords, and to make it manifest that the Provincial Synod of Canterbury strongly objects to the practices and doctrines inculcated therein, and on Wednesday, after an animated discussion, a resolution expressing concurrence with the declaration of the Upper House was carried by 62 to 6.

CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA.——On Friday last the 176th anniversary sermon of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was preached by Canon Duckworth, who said that the prospects of Christianity in India would be measured imperfectly by outward appearance; the railway, the printing press, the schools, and courts of justice were all so many auxiliaries in mission work. Even the occurrence of mutinies and famines helped forward the labours of the Society and kindred associations. At the present moment 4,000,000 Hindoo and 100,000 Mohammedan children were attending schools in India, and some 60,000 were receiving instruction up to the Universities' standard. It was quite impossible to overrate these influences. Their flow marked also the ebb of idolatry. There was, however, great need for increased efforts, for there were but 500 European and American missionaries to minister to the spiritual needs of 236,500,000 people.

The Church League held its first public meeting on Tuesday, under the presidency of the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie, who said that the Church, originally one in doctrine, was now split into a thousand divisions, and the only remedy was the separation of Church and State. It had been gradually dawning on men's minds that the work of severing the union was one rather for Churchmen than Nonconformists. John Keble maintained that the connection was positively sinful, and John Wesley was forced out of the Church simply because he was the only man within it in that corrupt period who could be found to preach true religion. Archdeacon Denison, whose speech was often interrupted, said that it was at length necessary for all true Churchmen to choose between Catholicity without Establishment and Establishment without Catholicity, and he felt it to be his duty to do what in him lay to help to sweep away the connection. Disestablishment was inevitable, not from without only, but from within. Another speaker declared his belief that, as soon as the object of the League was accomplished, Dissenters would return to the bosom of the Church; an assertion which was met by cries of "They will not come to 'The Priest in Absolution,'" followed by hisses and groans. Gradually the meeting grew more and more noisy and disorderly, and after the rejection of several amendments, the original resolution declaring that the true idea of a Christian Church was opposed to its union with the State, and another to the effect that the results of modern voluntary effort afforded the fullest assurance that the Church when disestablished would be amply provided for by the offerings of her members, were carried by a large majority. During the proceedings a lady made an ineffectual attempt to obtain a hearing, and, after an angry altercation with the chairman, left the platform declaring that, as neither the Archbishops nor the League would allow women to speak, she would go over to the Dissenters. The meeting broke up in confusion.

The Rev. T. Pelham Dale, rector of St. Vedast's, Foster Lane, who did not think proper to defend himself against the recent prosecution for Ritualistic practices, and against whom first a judgment and afterwards an inhibition was issued, has now obtained a triumphant victory upon a technical point of law. The Queen's Bench Division has decided that the Bishop of London was disqualified from acting in the matter, being interested in the voidance of the living as next patron. The whole proceedings are therefore void, and Mr. Dale may, we suppose, at once resume his position in the church, and continue his practices until again checked by a possible fresh prosecution. The Judges expressly say that they feel assured that the Bishop of London was not influenced by his personal interest in the living, but still the dry law of the point remains the same, and even if this had not been so, it seems likely that the whole proceedings would have been vitiated on another nice legal point; Lord Penzance having held his Court not in London or Westminster, as he should have done, but at Lambeth, which is outside the diocese. It is wonderful how closely the Ritualists appear to study the minutiæ of the law while treating its broad provisions with the most utter contempt.

A Quaker Wedding.——The marriage of Miss L. Ashworth, niece of the Right Hon. John Bright, to Mr. T. G. Palmer Hallett, of Bristol, was solemnised last week at Bath, the bride being a member of the Society of Friends, and the bridegroom a Churchman. The ceremony took place at the Friends' Meeting House, "a meeting for worship" having been called for the purpose. Mr. John Bright and Mr. Jacob Bright were both present, the former leading in the bride. The service proceeded in the manner invariably observed; the contracting parties rising during the "meeting for worship," and announcing to the assembled Friends their desire to become man and wife.

Various.——The Bishop of Chichester, speaking last week at the re-opening of Shoreham Church, justified his vote on the Burials Bill. He affirmed that the earnest desire of the clergy was for peace, and said that Lord Harrowby's proposition, if carried out, had a logical power which nothing could stop. It was just like introducing dynamite into a building; it must blow up the whole concern. Everybody must see that the way to the church was through the churchyard; and therefore they would be devoid of all common-sense and prudence if they did not stop them at the very outset.—The Rock, referring to the fourth annual volume of the "Tourists' Church Guide," notes the increase in the number of churches "where the law is broken" as compared with that of last year, and remarks that though the figures must to some people appear contemptibly small, it should be remembered that these "Romanesque Churches" form the advance-guard of the Ritualistic army which, unless checked would speedily overrun the kingdom.—Coming Events has a good story of a country clergyman, who, while on a visit to a certain noble lord in town, was prevailed upon to join in a game of cards at a club. They played till daybreak, and the parson rose the astonished winner of 1,500*l.* Next night the noble host suggested, as a matter of course, that he should give the losers their revenge. "No, no," was the reply, "you inveigled me into playing cards; or, if you like, the devil tempted me to play. Now, I look upon my winnings as spolia opima fairly taken from the Arch Enemy, and I intend to devote them towards building a new tower to my parish church."

SPORTING

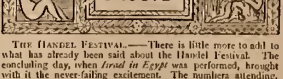
The Turf.——The July Meeting at Newmarket is always one of the landmarks in the Turf year, and by many real lovers of racing is enjoyed more than any other gathering. And no wonder, for its attractions are many. The course itself is a delightful one, pleasant shade is to be had beneath the trees, good horses of all ages put in an appearance, the blood-stock sales are most interesting, and the company generally is of "the right sort." In all particulars the meeting this week fulfilled the requirements to make things pleasant, and the racing itself was even above the usual standard. The First Welter resulted in a surprise, Lord Exeter's Vril, the least fancied of nine candidates, first catching the judge's eye; but on the next day, when made first favourite with 6 to 5 on him for the Second Welter, he was nowhere, thus illustrating the glorious uncertainty of racing. The July Stakes, as usual, brought out some dark and promising youngsters, but there were none good enough to beat the Duke of Westminster's Strathfleet, who won a Stake at Stockbridge last week. Lord Falmouth's Pacific, own brother to Atlantic, a former Two Thousand Guineas victor, was among the performers, and will be sure to see a better day. The talent made a good spot of Rosemary in a field of fourteen for the Maiden Plate on Tuesday. Lord Falmouth was to the fore in the Exeter Two Year Old Stakes with the previously victorious Redwing, and Springfield, as expected, had little difficulty in getting rid of the speedy horses, Lollypop, Trappist, and Ecossais, for the July Cup.—In the North the chief meeting has been at Carlisle, a kind of supplement to Newcastle, and there also the racing has been very good. Backers will remember the opening day, for Glendale, who ran Hampton such a very close race last week at Newcastle, was looked on as a certainty for the Cumberland Plate; but in a field of only four he had to put up with second place—another painful instance of Turf uncertainty. Hopbloom, whose career has been a somewhat chequered one, put in an appearance for the Grand Stand Handicap, and won it, The Prior of Prado, who was made favourite, only getting third. With the Sutton Park and Worcester Meetings the week has been a busy one; but the coming Liverpool gathering will probably be more interesting than either, the Summer Cup already having evoked considerable speculation. Judging from present appearances Petrarch is likely to be a very hot favourite; but it is just one of those cases in which backers are as likely to burn their fingers as to land their investments with interest.

Cricket.——There has been some rare cricketing during the last few days, the matches between the Amateur and Professional Elevens at the Oval and Lord's creating more than usual interest, and showing wonderfully close play. At the Oval the Players' first innings of 405 made things look pretty rosy for them, but almost all the Gentlemen made good scores, and amassed a total of 427, of which Mr. J. M. Cotterill made 59, and Mr. Hornby no less than 144 by a splendid exhibition of batting. The Players could only mark 119 in their second essay, thus leaving the Gentlemen only 98 runs to get to win. Time prevented the game being played out, but the draw was very decidedly in favour of the Amateurs. At Lord's the game was a very close one, the first innings of each side only showing a difference of 6 runs in favour of the Gentlemen. The Players' second innings finished for 148, thus leaving their opponents 143 to obtain. This they did, but when the two last men (Mr. G. F. Grace and Mr. Patterson) were in no less than 46 runs were wanted. These were gradually obtained, each hit being vociferously cheered, and amid a scene of excitement not often witnessed on a cricket field the game was won by the Gentlemen by 1 wicket. Finer all-round cricket has never been exhibited in London than in these two splendid matches.—The Surrey Club has made mincemeat of the South Wales Club at the Oval.

Aquatics.——We learn by telegraph that on the Parramatta River in Australia Rush has failed to wrest from Trickett the Sculling Championship of the world, for which the latter not long ago so gallantly defeated our champion, Sadler, on the Thames. We look in vain for a man likely to dispossess Trickett of his trophy for some time to come, our English scullers not showing in very brilliant colours just now.

Polo.——The Hurlingham Club has sustained a defeat at the hands of a picked team of the International Gun and Polo Club, who represented "the World." The riding and play on both sides was magnificent, and the game was considered by critics the fastest and best played contest ever witnessed.

Swimming.——The mile and six furlongs championship has been again contested between Putney and Hammersmith, the holder, E. T. Jones of Leeds and the once famous J. B. Johnson being the contestants. The result was—Jones first, and Johnson nowhere. If Jones can only hold—as he doubtless will—the handsome trophy till the 12th of September next, it will be his own for "ever and ever." Leeds should vote him a statue.



MUSIC

The Handel Festival.——There is little more to add to what has already been said about the Handel Festival. The concluding day, when Israel in Egypt was performed, brought with it the never-failing excitement. The numbers attending, however, were, for the first time on record, fewer than on the day devoted to the miscellaneous selection. We can only account for this by the fact that Madame Adelina Patti sang on the one occasion, and Mr. Sims Reeves did not sing on the other. That Madame Patti is always an attraction, per se, need no more be urged that that Mr. Sims Reeves, the foremost Handelian singer of our time, has been one of the main supports of the Festival from the beginning. The absence of Mr. Reeves, universally regretted, has been so generally commented upon that it would be superfluous to say another word on the subject. Apart from this, the performance of Handel's sublime Biblical oratorio was wonderfully good, and in the choral parts almost irreproachable. The solo singers were Mesdames Sherrington, Edith Wynne, and Patey, Herr Henschel, Messrs. Lloyd and Santley. How these excellent artists aided the general effect may be readily understood. As of old, the National Anthem was given (by chorus and orchestra) when the oratorio was brought to a close; and the usual recognition of Sir Michael Costa's valuable services followed. We have reason to believe that this last Handel Festival has not only been an artistic but a pecuniary success. It was admirably managed throughout by the directors of our time-honoured Sacred Harmonic Society.

Royal Italian Opera.——As we cannot conscientiously say one word in praise of the opera Santa Chiara, which—it is difficult to guess why—after a repose of nearly a quarter of a century Mr. Gye has brought to life again for the edification of his subscribers and the public, we limit ourselves to merely stating the fact that it has been represented twice, and on each occasion before an audience utterly unable to see, however willing to recognise, any merit whatever in the work, whether in a dramatic or a musical sense. Requiescat in pace! The last performance of La Traviata calls for notice, if only on account of Madame Adelina Patti's impersonation of the character of Violetta, than which nothing more refined and exquisite—while characteristic throughout—has been witnessed in our time on the lyric stage. In M. Gounod's somewhat languid and spun-out Romeo e Giulietta—with its constant reminiscences of Faust, its feeble imitations of the dramatic "ensembles" of Meyerbeer, and its still feebler attempts at rivalling the not easily-definable "melos," and infinitely variegated orchestral colouring of Wagner—the extraordinary genius of this gifted lady shines no less conspicuously. She is not merely a singing Juliet, but an acting Juliet now beyond compare; and, if only for her sake, the revival of this most pretentious, though, artistically and poetically considered, the least successful work by the much-admired French composer, must always be more or less welcome. We wish, however, the accomplished songstress would omit the trivial waltz tune interpolated in the first act, which seems to have sprung from the popular waltz tune of Arditi ("Il bacio") just as the waltz tune of Arditi sprang from the no less popular waltz-tune of Venzano—once the favourite "show-piece" of the late Madame Gassier. This is so entirely out of keeping with the dreamy character of Juliet as seriously to disturb the main business of the first act. Madame Patti sings it irreproachably, no doubt; but the better it is executed the more does it jar upon our feelings while contemplating the ideal creation of Shakespeare. All the rest—to the very last scene, culminating in the death of the "star-crossed lovers"—is absolute perfection. Signor Nicolini is now unquestionably the best Romeo on the lyric stage, looking, singing, and acting the part equally well. In the garden scene especially he played up to Madame Patti with remarkable intelligence, and elsewhere supported her most effectively—which, bearing in mind what sort of an artist was his partner, is equivalent to awarding him almost unmeasured praise. Signor Cotogni, as Mercutio, is not exactly at his best; nor does he possess the requisite capability of giving due significance to the description of "Queen Mab," even had M. Gounod illustrated it by happier music. Mdlle. Bianchi is an unexceptionable Stefano; Signor Bagagiolo a Frate Lorenzo, to whom Juliet's exclamation, "Oh, comfortable friar!" might reasonably apply; and Signor Graziani does all that lies in him to make the personage of Capuletto conspicuous. On the whole the performance of M. Gounod's opera, under the direction of Signor Bevignani, is more than ordinarily efficient; but that it can ever become as popular as Faust is unlikely. Two weeks hence the season will come to an end. The only novelty now to be expected is Otto Nicolai's Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, under the hardly expressive title of Le Vispe Comari di Windsor. The opera announced for this evening is Lohengrin.

Her Majesty's Theatre.——The new singer, Madame Etelka Gerster, has followed up her success as the heroine of La Sonnambula by another success as the heroine of Lucia di Lammermoor. Her Lucia is very much the same kind of performance as her Amina, always artistic, not seldom astonishing, but rarely distinguished by that undefinable something which we distinctively recognise as "charm." Madame Gerster possesses a voice of more than ordinary capability, and uses it very frequently to excellent purpose—sometimes, indeed, creating real enthusiasm. But while at times satisfying all requirements, at others she falls short of them; and thus her performance, regarded from a general point of view, is unequal. Her Lucia, however, obtained quite as much applause as her Amina, and Mr. Mapleson has every right to look upon her as a genuine acquisition to his already strong company. The opera on Thursday was Lohengrin, which independently of its other claims to notice must always interest when Madame Christine Nilsson represents the dreamy character of Elsa. Mr. Mapleson's season will, we understand, finish a week later than Mr. Gye's. No novelty, however, is advertised.

Waifs.——We regret to say that the state of Mdlle. Titiens' health is such as to encourage no hope of her appearing again this season.—More than 9,000 persons attended the concert of Mr. Sims Reeves in the Albert Hall on Wednesday night. Madame Christine Nilsson, Madame Trebelli, Herr Wilhelmj, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Signor Foli, Messrs. Santley, Lloyd, &c., were among the artists who assisted our great English tenor on the occasion. Mr. Sims Reeves was greeted with the utmost enthusiasm.—M. Francis Planté, the distinguished French pianist, played on Thursday afternoon (for the first time in England) at the French Embassy, in aid of the French Charities, Leicester Place. We shall have more to say about this gentleman.

Steam Tram Cars are about to be tried in Dublin on a line four miles in length extending from the City to the suburban town of Clontarf.

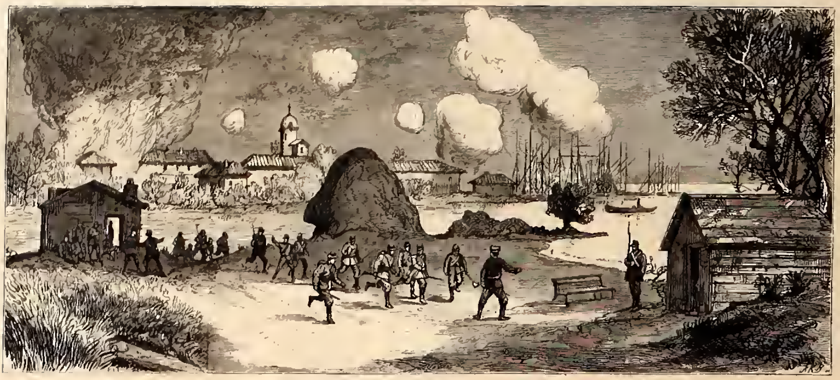
A Railroad connecting San Francisco with Buenos Ayres is being discussed in California. The line would be about 6,900 miles in length.

Two New Statues by Millet have been added to the chapel of the Orleans family at Dreux—figures of the Princess Adelaide and Prince Ferdinand, the son of the Duc de Montpensier, who died some time since while studying in Paris.

Suicides in San Francisco Hotels are so frequent nowadays that the proprietors find a difficulty in getting servants. The San Francisco News Letter declares it is quite a common thing for domestics to call down the speaking tube, "Some one dead in No. 490, and a man taken poison in No. 302;" while they consider it a most unusual occurrence if they do not hear the crack of a bullet at least once in the day.

The Emperor of Brazil, who is now once more in England, is more easy of access in his own country than any of his subjects. Every Thursday any person who may wish to speak to him is admitted to the Palace and waits in a long gallery. At a certain time Don Pedro walks down the room, listens to every request, replies to each gentleman in his respective native language (His Majesty is a wonderful linguist), and never makes a promise without fulfilling it, as he has an excellent memory.

American Farmers in New Jersey are afflicted by a fresh plague this year, the Cicada or seventeen year locusts having appeared. These insects, though called locusts, are of quite a different family, and are more like flies, while their habits are most curious. The eggs are laid deep down in some tender twig or branch in clusters of fifteen or twenty, and are hatched in five or six weeks. The larvæ fall to the ground, and work their way down to a considerable depth, where they remain dormant for seventeen years. A record of the appearance of these pests has been carefully kept, and it has been certified that they come at regular periods, and that another species, the thirteen-year brood, inhabit the Southern States. Strong trees are not touched by the Cicada; but the peach-trees and young fruit-trees in general receive considerable damage, while the branches in which the eggs are laid soon wither off and fall.



SKETCHES UNDER FIRE—THE BOMBARDMENT OF GIURGEVO

MONUMENT AT LEWES TO RUSSIAN PRISONERS OF WAR

A MASSIVE monument to the memory of the 28 Finlanders who died in Lewes Prison while prisoners of war during the Russian campaign has just been completed in St. John's Churchyard, Lewes, by order of the Russian Government. Recently the work was officially inspected and approved by General Gorloff. Mr. Philip Currey, of London, is the architect. The total height is seventeen feet. The monument is an octagon, starting from a broad base of stone steps, tapering upwards and surmounted by a Greek cross, in which is inserted the kneeling steps peculiar to Russian crosses. In the base are eight arch-shaped recesses, supported by pillars of granite. On these are inscribed the objects of the memorial, the names of the prisoners who died, and other particulars. The monument is erected immediately over the spot where the burials were made. On the east of the monument the inscription is:—"Sacred to the Memory of the Russian Soldiers who died Prisoners of War in Lewes in the years 1854, 1855, and 1856." On the west it is recorded, "Raised by Order of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia Alexander II., 1877." The names of the men and four lines of a hymn fill the remaining spaces.

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE

THE works connected with the removal of the Alexandrian obelisk go on apace. Mr. Dixon's workmen have cleared the ground away, the great stone itself has been thoroughly cleaned, and is found to be in much better preservation than was imagined. It has been lifted and moved round into position parallel with the sea, and the ironwork of the vessel is being built around it.

Many interesting antiquarian facts have already been brought to light. The exact date of the removal of these two obelisks has hitherto been mere conjecture. It was known they adorned the Temple of Heliopolis—the great University City of On, where Moses acquired his proficiency in "the learning and wisdom of the Egyptians." As they were removed thence to decorate the water-gate of the Cæsareum at Alexandria, it has been assumed that this took place about the time of Cleopatra, hence the popular name of Cleopatra's Needle. Doubt, however, is now set at rest, Mr. Dixon having had the base of the standing obelisk uncovered, and found the inscription "Anno VII. Cæsario, Barbarus præfectus Ægypti posuit, architectore Pontio." "In the seventh year of Cæsar, Barbarus, Prefect of Egypt, caused this obelisk to be placed here, Pontus being architect."

The excavation has also revealed another interesting fact, viz., that the obelisk stands on a pedestal of a square block of granite, upon which it is supported by four bronze crabs. The crab at the south-east corner is missing, and as the obelisk leans towards the north and west to the extent of a foot from the perpendicular the pressure on the missing bronze would be removed, and thus have permitted its abstraction. As the obelisk is raised eight inches clear of the pedestal the entire weight rests on its corner supports. These are bending, and there is a serious crack in the stone, so that unless steps be taken to secure it a few more winters will probably see it prostrate.—Our illustration is from a photograph forwarded by Mr. Wagerman Dixon, who has charge of the operations in Egypt.

Hertford College, Oxford.——A curious dispute as to the meaning of the University Tests Act of 1871 has just been decided in the Queen's Bench Division. It will be remembered that in 1874 the property of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, which had been for some time in abeyance, was transferred by Act of Parliament to the newly-founded Hertford College, and that soon afterwards Mr. Baring, an old Oxford man, made a handsome gift to the College, stipulating that it was to be used solely for the benefit of members of the Church of England. This endowment was employed in founding fellowships, and all went well until the examinations were announced, when a certain Mr. Tillyard, a Nonconformist, offered himself as a candidate for the vacant fellowship, and on being told that he was ineligible, retired without troubling to compete. As soon, however, as the election was over, he appealed to the law to compel the College authorities to examine him as a candidate, it being contended on his behalf that the Test Act of 1871 had a prospective bearing which made it illegal for Mr. Baring to attach any restrictive condition to his gift. Mr. Justice Mellor decided that this was really the case, while Mr. Justice Lush gave judgment on the same side, though for a very different reason, namely that the Act of Incorporation contained references to the Act of 1871, which made it subject to the provisions of the latter. The decision will no doubt be submitted to the Court of Appeal, whose judgment will be looked forward to with much anxiety.

Mr. De Morgan's rough-and-ready method of settling disputes between Commoners and Lords of the Manor has at last been checked by the strong arm of the law. The Master of the Rolls has granted an injunction restraining him from pulling down any more posts or fences on Hackney Downs, and another in respect of the sand-pit at Plumstead, which he and his friends have filled up. There is also to be an inquiry in Chambers as to the amount of damage the plaintiffs have sustained, and two other actions, one by Earl Cowper in respect of property in Nottinghamshire, and the other by a Mr. Flint, are still pending. No one would for a moment dispute the importance of preserving for public use the few remaining open spaces in and near the metropolis, but there must surely be some less violent method of attaining that end than that of which Mr. De Morgan considers himself the apostle.

A Big Robbery.——A man and two women are now in custody charged with being concerned in a burglary which was committed about three weeks since on the premises of an ostrich feather merchant in Clerkenwell. The thieves carried off 6,000 feathers, valued at 3,000*l.*, besides some watches, jewellery, and money to the amount of another 1,000*l.*; and on the premises of one of the women charged were found three opera-glasses, four pieces of silk, one of velvet, one of cloth, some plated forks and spoons, six night-shirts, and a lady's companion, which are supposed to be the proceeds of another robbery, but which have not yet been claimed.

Miscellaneous Items.——It has been decided that the ratepayers of Keighley will have to pay the costs (125*l.*) incurred by the anti-vaccination Guardians in their resistance of the Local Government Board.—At Reading last week a curious action for libel and conspiracy was brought by an aged solicitor of Ewelme, in Oxfordshire, against a number of persons resident in that place who, some seven years ago, had treated him to "rough music" and publicly burnt him in effigy, in consequence of his having quarrelled with his wife. A verdict was given for the defendants in all cases except one, which was allowed to go by default, and in which one farthing damages was awarded.—In an assault case heard at Warrington last week the defendant asserted that so far from being the aggressor he himself had been subjected by the prosecutors to violence because he would not join a local secret society, the members of which were compelled to take a very sanguinary oath expressive of their readiness to kill father, mother, sister, or brother when a colleague was in distress. The society, he said, was connected with the "Hibernians," which held their meetings at a "jerry-house" on Sundays. On Friday last Inspector Vesey, of the Derby police, was murderously attacked by a fellow whom he attempted to arrest on suspicion of having robbed a till. The ruffian first snapped a pistol in the officer's face, and afterwards stabbed him several times in the wrists and neck. The would-be assassin, who is a well-known thief, is now in custody, whilst Inspector Vesey lies in a precarious condition at the hospital.—People whose trading proclivities lead them to study with avidity the exchange columns which have become so popular in certain periodicals, should make sure before parting with their knick-nacks, lace, jewellery, fancy work, books, papers, or pet dogs that they are negotiating with honest correspondents. Two Liverpool clerks, who have for some time past made this barter system a source of profit by frequently changing their address and never sending anything in return for the property sent to them, have just been sent to prison for a year.—The Echo says that seven or nine gems (it is curious that any uncertainty should exist as to the number) were recently stolen from the British Museum, and that two of them have since been recovered through the honesty of the dealers to whom they were offered for sale.—On Sunday last a young woman of eighteen gave herself up to the police at Notting Hill, alleging that she had killed her fellow-servant at the country house of Sir Adam Bittleston, in Buckinghamshire. She described how she had been scolded by her victim, whom she had then struck on the head with a poker, leaving her dead in the chair. Upon inquiry, however, it turned out that no such crime had been committed, and although the girl had really left the house suddenly on the day she named, there was no reason for her doing so. Before the magistrate she denied having signed the statement, and she is now under remand that the state of her mind may be ascertained.—A disgusting story comes from Wolverhampton. Last week a woman named Rogers was murdered by her husband, who, it seems was jealous of her. He confessed his crime and has been committed for trial, and, it is said, untruthfully we hope, that those who had charge of the body exhibited it publicly at so much per head until the police interfered.—At the Hampshire Assizes, a young woman of twenty has been sentenced to death for the murder of her infant child, which she killed by beating it on the head, and afterwards buried under a heap of stones. When arrested she exclaimed that she knew the body was found at twelve o'clock, for at that time the child appeared to her. Curiously enough that was about the time at which a police sergeant discovered the body.—Richard and Anne Sidlow have been convicted of ill-treating the two little pauper girls placed in their care by the Nantwich Guardians, and have been sentenced, the man to nine months' and the woman to fifteen months' hard labour.—Mr. and Mrs. Morris, of Slough, did not appear at the Aylesbury Assizes to answer the charge of cruelty to their servant. Their bail has therefore been estreated and a warrant issued for their apprehension. The poor girl, who since February last has been in the Princess Louise Home at Wanstead, is now restored to health. The trial was not transferred to the Queen's Bench because the necessary sureties had not been given.

In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED
THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. H. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. Parker. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it hearty enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 29 and 31, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

CHAPMAN'S, NOTTING HILL.

MR. CHAPMAN'S SPRING NOVELTIES.

Extract from the Queen, June 2, 1877.

Mr. Chapman, of Notting Hill, has forwarded a selection of samples of fancy materials for spring and summer wear in such variety and quantity that embarras de choix is the first feeling that they suggest. But new dresses are almost imperative necessities at this season, and a large choice is always welcome to the bona fide shopper; therefore Mr. Chapman has shown wisdom in catering thus extensively among home and foreign manufacturers. Foremost there are new washing fabrics called Bolton yarns or workhouse sheetings, not plain and unbleached as we have been used to, but cream grounds, covered with thin lines and dashes of dark red, blue, or black. They are light, and the effect is that that of a neigeuse cloth. Then these are dark blue, green, and brown fabrics, striped with thick and thin lines of contrasting colour, exact imitations in style of the costly twilled silks worn during the winter. Other dark cambrics are striped with Persian patterns; basket-woven linens, and damask linens, close imitations of silken fabrics, are also there in many fashionable colours. In fine fabrics of ivory white, tilleul, and other pale hues, there is a new challie gauze, soft in texture, and admirable for draping. In thicker materials there is the new loule cashmere in all the fashionable shades; it is light and soft, and makes up well, as it hangs in graceful folds without any stiffness. Casemir is another thin woollen material of a clinging nature with a twilled surface, and yet cool enough for summer wear. In silks those called the Mehrettes deserve special notice; they are soft and yielding, with a satin surface, and the patterns, though small and geometrical, are effective; in all the pale shades, such as blue, tilleul, pink, and ivory, they would make up well for evening wear. The broché Mahrattee, besides making up into stylish polonaises, would serve to trim evening dresses, as they are all self-coloured. Mr. Chapman possesses the art, and it is no small one, of bringing forward fashionable styles and patterns in cheap materials particularly suitable for young people; and those who do not care to expend large sums on short lived fashions, but who desire to keep pace with la mode, are likely to accord a warm welcome to these inexpensive fabrics. Another novelty in Mr. Chapman's packets are some embroidered stays; the embroidery is white, and ornaments the busk, gussets, and top and bottom of the corset. Embroidery is now found in every article of underlinen, even on the balayeuses which line the hems of our skirts. Stays alone were left out of the embroiderer's hand, and these now Mr. Chapman has added to the list of ornamental under wear.

FURTHER DEPRESSION IN THE LYONS SILK MARKETS.

BLACK SILKS.

RICH THICK CORDED Gros Grains, 4s. 11d. per yard, superb in colour and finish, equal in value to those usually sold at 7s. 6d. with as much appearance as Messrs BONNET'S at 15s. per Yard. WILL WEAR as well as any Silk than can be bought at the same price in England, but Ladies must not confound them with my celebrated IMPERIAL Silks, which are altogether a different manufacture.

COLOURED SILKS.

Rich quality	3s. 11d per yard.
Very superior value . . .	5s. 6d "
Magnificent Rich Failles . .	6s. 11d. "

JAPANESE SILKS.

THE MOST EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT IN LONDON TO SELECT FROM

In consequence of the depreciation in the value of silk, I am compelled to reduce the whole of my Japanese Stock very nearly to what they cost me. The new tariff is as under:

Brilliant quality . . .	1s. 9½d. per yard.
The richest quality made, .	2s. 4½d. "

MAHARATTA SILKS.

Fashions, like history, repeat themselves. A more apt illustration of this saying could scarcely be found than the present rage for the pure, soft, undressed Silks, that are now rivalling those of Grains and Failles, which have been so long popular. These beautiful Silks are eminently adapted for the close-clinging draperies of the reigning styles, and the unlimited variety of this speciality would alone secure for them a large amount of patronage; but the designs are in most specimens quite artistic. There is the Pompadour and Bouquetière styles, ornamented with bouquets and sprays of foliage scattered over the surface; some of them are brocaded, or have satin and silvery flakes, harmonising with the colour of the background; while others have infinitesimal hues of alternate bright and dead-looking satin, slightly waved, covering the surface. For outdoor costumes dark tints still enjoy great favour, but in evening dress the most delicate hues are worn. These silks are my exclusive specialty.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES'

DANISH SILK-FINISHED TINTED ALPACAS

(AS WORN BY H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES).

Alpaca has always been a favourite dress material, and it certainly has not lost its popularity during the last few years. Since I had the good fortune to introduce the celebrated Danish Silk-Finished Tinted Alpacas to the public, the annual sale has more than trebled. The manufacture is brought to such perfection that for many purposes Alpaca is used in place of Silk. Imitations of it are numerous, but not one has ever been made to compare with the genuine article for brilliancy and lightness. The most perfect and by far the largest assortment to select from in the metropolis. Over fifty new tinted shades, any length cut, 1s. 11½d. per yard, 28 inches wide.

"Messrs. Chapman, of Notting Hill, stand alone for their chaste and elegant Costumes of what they term Danish Alpaca, for which they gain a special prize."—Vide Standard, Oct. 5, 1876.

The Daily Telegraph, of the same date, writes:

"Especially commendable is a white and cerulean blue promenade dress called the Danish, as a compliment to the Princess of Wales." The Price of Danish Alpaca is 1s. 11½d. per yard, 100 shades.

CHAPMAN, Notting Hill.

ENGLISH POPLINS.

The widespread depression in the silk trade and the very low prices at which the raw material is being offered, compel holders of manufactured goods to realise their stocks at considerable loss. Under these exceptional conditions I have purchased over TWO HUNDRED Pieces of English made Poplins, so nearly resembling real Irish that it would require a very good judge indeed to detect the difference. For superior finish and genuine value these Poplins will outrival anything I have ever sold at the price. 1s. 11½d. per yard. A REDUCTION OF ONE PENNY PER YARD WILL BE ALLOWED TO PURCHASES OF A WHOLE PIECE, ABOUT 48 YARDS.

FRENCH CASHMERE.

In the most perfect and beautiful shades that can be imagined. Cashmere is a fabric that adapts itself more easily than any other to the dyer's art, and the many lovely colours which I have had specially produced to match the silk cannot fail to elicit the admiration of the most sceptical. In ordering, ladies are desired to notice the width, viz., 48 inches, 3s. 3d. per yard.

TO ALL WHO ARE DESIROUS OF SECURING A BARGAIN.

Large quantities of DRESS FABRICS, chiefly Checks and Stripes, in perfect condition, cost from 1s. to 3s. per yard, will be sold at 6d. to 1s. per yard. Unusual importance should be attached to this advertisement. Patterns free.

CHAPMAN'S, Notting Hill.

ALGERIAN GAUZE.

These Gauzes are marvels of inventive genius. Like all other new materials, gauzes exhibit the prevailing taste for the Oriental Style. There are Openworked Checks, Honeycombed Stripes, Lattice Stripes, Raised Silk Arabesques, fine silk lines, crossed by bars of thick flossy satin. The Algerian Gauze, with its opaque silk stripe, alternating with others of rich thick silk, is particularly appropriate for evening and dressy toilettes. Another new material, Fine Wool Barege, is a charming fabric for summer wear, in a variety of shades, to match either silk or cashmere, in accordance with the prevalence for combining two or three materials in a single costume.

SWISS EMBROIDERIES.

The selection I offer to the public in these beautiful works is something enormous, several hundred patterns to choose from. The prices are perfectly marvellous, beneath anything that has ever been heard of. Some splendid designs at 6d. per yard, fit for the richest garment, and at 1s. per yard. They are perfect marvels of ingenuity and skill, far superior to anything that can be bought at double the price. Beautiful little edging at 2d. per yard. Patterns free.

HALF-A-SOVEREIGN FOR A FRENCH-WOVE CORSET.

Richly embroidered in every gore, also entirely down front. A beautiful specimen of French workmanship. Admirably suited for the present cuirasse bodices, being a deep corset with spoon busk. Size of waist only requisite. Forwarded to any part of the Kingdom on receipt of P.O.O.

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF SHUMLA AND ITS ENVIRONS

THE WAR IN THE EAST—WITH THE TURKS AT SHUMLA

Topics of the Week

Cruelties in the East.——Shocking tales are beginning to be told of the manner in which the present war is being conducted. Each side accuses the other of the most horrible cruelties; and the English newspapers as a rule give credence to the reports very much in accordance with their political sympathies. The Daily News gives slight prominence to the rumours which reach it respecting the barbarities of the Russians, whereas the wicked deeds of the Turks are daily branded with appropriate epithets; the Daily Telegraph, on the other hand, is fond of talking of "the patient and gallant Osmanlis," but cannot find words vehement enough to express its horror at Muscovite atrocities. On the whole, we fear, impartial observers must admit that neither army is much better than the other. English people constantly forget that the conflict is not being carried on by two thoroughly civilised peoples. The capabilities of the Turks, unfortunately, we have had only too good occasion to know; but the Russians are not really much ahead of them in the qualities which Western nations most highly esteem. Russia has grown up under influences wholly different from those which have determined the progress of England, Germany, and France. In ordinary circumstances the people may be as mild and genial as many travellers assert; but beneath the surface are all the elements of the most dangerous kind of fanaticism: the fanaticism of religion and the fanaticism of race. These elements have now been let loose, and it was to be expected that they would work terrible havoc among those against whom they are directed. All the same, however, the cruelties of the Russians are far more to be blamed than those of the Turks. The latter do not pretend to be fighting for more than their own interests; the former have nominally drawn the sword in defence of humanity and freedom. We should think that even the enthusiasts of St. James's Hall must be beginning to have some doubt whether, after all, these good things had so very much to do with Prince Gortschakoff's programme.

Earlier Hours Wanted.—It is not necessary to suppose that the compact little phalanx of Parliamentary obstructives are as sincere as was the late Mr. Joseph Brotherton in their desire to send the House of Commons to bed at midnight. They are aiming at other objects, and, if these objects were attained, the House might sit, for aught they would care, till sunrise during every night of the Session. Nevertheless, whether these gentlemen are sincere or not in their go-to-bed crusade, there is much force in their arguments in favour of earlier hours, nor can we admit that reform in this respect would be as difficult as has been represented. The time of day during which the House of Commons transacts its business is a matter of importance, not merely to the members themselves, but to the whole nation, because the House is the "Big Ben" by which all the clocks of Society, great and small, are regulated. Late hours on the part of the House generate late hours elsewhere, and so the whole community is gradually infiltrated with lateness. In this connexion, two points are worth bearing in mind, the first that, of all civilised nations, we are the latest in our habits; the second, that our late-hour system is a modern innovation, and cannot therefore be fairly charged on the damp and chilly weather prevailing during a large part of the year. Gas and good roads have, no doubt, had much to do with making us night-birds. When street-lighting was in its infancy, and roads were execrable, people appreciated daylight far more than they now do; and "the perils and dangers of the night" had a far more real significance to our ancestors than they have to ourselves. The lateness of the House of Commons, and consequently of Society generally, is chiefly due to the fact that we moderns want to get thirty-six hours' work out of a day twenty-four hours long, and that we borrow the small hours from Tuesday to lengthen Monday. The Emperor of Brazil is a wiser man; he begins his day early, and so, when midnight comes, has had his full "whack" out of it. Is it impossible for us to imitate this illustrious example? Why should we not push everything on two hours, begin work at eight where we now begin at ten, and so forth? Just during the depth of winter we should have to rise in the dark, but for nine months of the year we should gain wholesome daylight, which costs nothing; and save unwholesome lamplight, which costs a good deal. Early rising, too, would strengthen our bodies. Leigh Hunt, we remember, in one of his delightful essays, speaks of the high animal spirits prevailing in the seventeenth century, notwithstanding the manifold evils which our ancestors had to endure, and he attributes it to the habit of early rising which then prevailed.

Manchester and India.——The interests of Manchester were well represented on Tuesday in the debate in Parliament on the duties levied on cotton manufactures imported into India. Mr. Jacob Bright claimed that these duties should be abolished on the ground that it was the working man rather than the rich capitalist who would benefit by the change, and it would be impossible to conceive a more alluring way of arguing the question. The majority were, however, undoubtedly right in refusing to sanction the proposal. No one disputes that if it were possible it would be highly desirable to deliver trade from this particular burden; but fortunately we are now beginning to learn that even the welfare of the English working man must not be allowed to override that of India herself. If these duties were removed, how would the deficiency be made up? Notwithstanding our energetic and just mode of government in India, the country is still poor. Every possible means of raising revenue has been tried, and to do away with the cotton duties would simply be to put money into the pockets of the Manchester capitalist and working man at the cost of our Indian fellow subjects. It is true that the cotton trade would receive a considerable impetus in India, but the increased prosperity resulting from this source would not nearly make up for the loss sustained for the benefit of Manchester. As Sir George Campbell pointed out, if any remissions are to be made, we ought to begin with grievances which affect the humblest class, and of these the salt duty is undoubtedly the chief. It is deplorable that it should still be necessary to tax so essential a commodity. The burden of the cotton duties falls mainly upon the middle and upper classes, but everybody suffers from the high price which has to be paid for salt. What if the Manchester manufacturers were to agitate for a reform in this direction?

Reckless Street Driving.——There is an old American story to the effect that several judges in succession, travelling a certain circuit out West, were set upon by swarms of wild bees, and stung to death. The fatality became so common that the newspapers were in the habit of chronicling the occurrence in a single line, "We have just lost another judge by bees." Remembering that three years ago Lord Beaconsfield was nearly run over, and that Mr. Gladstone narrowly escaped a similar fate the other day, we may think ourselves fortunate that we have not to report, "We have just lost another ex-Premier by hansom-cab." As Premiers and ex-Premiers are not very numerous, and two have nearly been sacrificed within three years to the cab Juggernaut, the inference is that the cases of narrow escapes on the part of less distinguished members of the community are multitudinous. The mischief is, of course, attributable to unduly rapid, not to say reckless, driving on the part of cabmen, nor is it easy to suggest an efficient remedy. In spite of the important concession of the shilling fare for any distance under two miles, the legal cab-tariff is, looking at the price of horse-flesh and horse-food, considerably below the true market rate. If everybody paid the exact legal fare, and no more, cabmen would be unable to make both ends meet. Few of us, however, possess the Prodgerian faculties requisite for such a herculean task, and so some submit to extortion, others pay too much from pure ignorance, while the large majority—especially business men, who are the chief hansom-cab users—pay with intentional liberality, and expect high speed in exchange. Now think of the temptation to the cabman. Beneath sits a fare who is prepared to pay at the rate of a penny a minute, but who demands pace, and so cabby goes the pace. As a rule he drives carefully, but he makes many narrow shaves, and, as on wood or asphalte his vehicle is nearly as noiseless as a bicycle, people who are deaf or short-sighted run considerable risks after dark in some thoroughfares. It is a question whether, as in nine cases out of ten the passenger is the exciting cause of the rapid pace, the passenger should not be punished as well as the cabman in cases of accident from over-driving.

Freedom in Education.——It is characteristic of the time that not a murmur was raised this week in the House of Commons at the increased demands Lord Sandon had to make for elementary schools. Everybody was pleased that there should be such very decided signs of a growing interest in education among all classes. It is undoubted that within the last few years immense progress has been made in this most important of all departments of the national life; and Englishmen may be allowed to congratulate themselves on the fact without laying themselves open to the charge of patriotic vanity. At the same time there are some dangers against which we shall have to be on our guard, and one of them was well pointed out by Sir J. Lubbock, who deserves great credit for his persistent efforts to introduce freshness and intelligence into the methods of popular education. The peril to which we refer is the tendency to make our whole system too mechanical. A French Minister, pointing to his watch, once proudly declared to a foreign visitor that he could mention precisely the lesson going on at that moment in every town and hamlet of France. A rigid system of this kind has great attraction for a certain class of minds, and it has the undoubted advantage of being comparatively easily worked. But it destroys all individuality in the teacher's mode of impressing his pupils; and we sincerely hope the goal is one we shall never reach in this country. Up to a certain point the work of the elementary schoolmaster must, of course, be prescribed to him, but he ought to be allowed the utmost freedom that is compatible with due attention to essential subjects. One teacher, for instance, will be particularly interested in some branch of physical science, another in English literature. Why should not each be allowed to modify his general arrangements so that he may do full justice to his particular subjects? Then, every town, every district, has particular characteristics and wants of its own. Nothing but good can come of allowing the schoolmaster to adapt his instructions to these. The greater his freedom the more heartily will he enjoy his work.

Alabama Bonds.——An illiterate creditor being asked what composition he would take in lieu of his claim on a certain bankrupt estate, replied gruffly, "I don't want any dirty composition, I wants my money." His sentiments probably closely corresponded to those of the English holders of "Alabama Eight per Cent. Gold State Bonds," a species of security which, though bearing a title intensely attractive to the small investor, can scarcely have yielded unmixed satisfaction to its purchasers. Like most of the ex-Slave States since the Civil War, Alabama is very poor, she has no hard cash wherewith to discharge her liabilities, but she is still in possession of waste lands, and, under certain conditions, she has made over a portion of these lands to her creditors. The bargain seems to be rather a hard one for the bondholders, because there is evidently no brisk natural demand for these waste lands, and because out of the meagre sums thus realised the State demands a royalty of ten per cent. Altogether, the scheme appears remarkably ingenious, for not only does Alabama extinguish her liabilities, but she also artificially stimulates the sale of lands which would otherwise have hung on hand for years to come, and pockets a liberal percentage on each transaction. Still, half a loaf is better than no bread, and we suspect that Turkish bondholders would be well pleased if the Porte made a similar arrangement, provided—therein lies the difficulty—they could guarantee the undisturbed possession of the property in question.

Ladies and Fashion.——A lady standing the other day before a shop window put her hand into her pocket and found it already occupied by a hand which had certainly no right to be there. The owner of the strange hand, whose designs were clearly open to suspicion, was forthwith delivered over to the police. This was quite right, but we confess we have some sympathy with the magistrate, who protested not only that ladies act unwisely in carrying purses in exposed pockets, but that these pockets themselves are "a very unfortunate fashion." They are not beautiful, and they seem to be made for the express purpose of tempting the interesting class who get a living out of their neighbours' handkerchiefs. Who are the mysterious people who determine the precise point at which a pocket shall be placed? And why do ladies so humbly follow the orders of their concealed tyrants? These questions are far beyond the range of the male intellect; but surely, with all respect to the high intelligence of English ladies, they are in such matters a little too submissive. We have no desire to see them blooming out in the original costumes adopted by certain advanced champions of feminine rights in America; and it may be admitted that there is a lawful pleasure in following to some extent the varying commands of fashion. But when a fashion is clearly absurd, what possible reason can there be for women, who are otherwise thoroughly independent, meekly following in the wake of the crowd? Frenchwomen are far more free, and it is not generally believed that they are worse dressed than Englishwomen. A little of the comic spirit applied to dress would be of great advantage to our countrywomen, for the basis of the comic spirit is no more exalted quality than good sense.

THE WAR IN THE EAST

THE GREAT CROSSING OF THE DANUBE AT SIMNITZA

OUR principal sketches this week illustrate what as yet has been the greatest event of the campaign—the crossing of the Danube from Simnitza to Sistova on the 27th ult., by the troops under the command of the Grand Duke Nicholas, the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian army of the Danube. For some time previously, in order to mislead the Turks respecting the real point of crossing, the Russians had kept up vigorous bombardments of Nikopolis on the one side and Rotschok on the other side of Sistova, and on the very same day a feint was made to cross from Turnu Magurelli, where the presence of the Czar lent an apparent importance to the movement, and called off the enemy's attention from the real attempt lower down the river. Our panorama, sketched by our artist from the heights of Simnitza, will give the reader a fair idea of the actual place of crossing, which is minutely described in the admirable despatch of the Daily News correspondent detailing the events of the day. Sistova is situated almost opposite to Simnitza, and for two miles down the river the Turkish bank is steep, in places quite precipitous, with here and there little hollows, while above the river side are steep wooded slopes covered with gardens and vineyards leading to a bare ridge forming the sky line. At the end of the two miles is a narrow marked depression in the bank leading up from a little cove formed by the affluents of a small stream. To the right of this cove was a small camp of Turkish soldiers, stationed there doubtless in consciousness of the weakness of the point, and above the camp on the sky line was a battery of heavy guns. Between the cove and Sistova several cannon were disposed under cover of the trees, and immediately on the proper right of the town was a small earthwork armed with a few field guns.

To turn to the Roumanian side, depicted in the foreground of the panorama, the bank proper is high, but between it and the main stream of the Danube lies a broad tract partly of green meadow, partly of sand, partly of tenacious mud—the whole just emerging from inundation. This flat is cut off from Simnitza by a narrow arm of the Danube, so that it really is an island. A raised road and bridge leading from the town across the flats to the landing place on the Danube had been wrecked by the floods, so that it was necessary for the Russians to gain access to the flats by a short pontoon bridge. These flats were scored with intersecting streams, and studded with impracticable swamps, so that the road through them was extremely difficult and tortuous. They were quite bare with the exception of a wood of willows and alders exactly opposite to the above-mentioned cove on the Turkish bank. The Danube there is about 1,200 paces wide, and opposite Sistova is a small island, which, however, played no part in the crossing. The Roumanian bank is steep and sloping, so that troops could not be brought from Simnitza wholly unobserved, and this fact enabled the Turks to prepare what resistance they could offer when the movement was perceived.

Under the friendly cover of the willows a small fleet of rafts and boats, capable of holding from fifteen to forty men, had been collected by General Dragimiroff, on the evening of the 26th, and during the night a row of field guns was planted along the edge of the flats to command the opposite bank. Columns of infantry also were marched down over the flats to the wood, and in the grey dawn of the morning the first boats, containing a detachment of the 14th Division, under Major-General Yolchine, were sent off, the boats being rowed across singly. The Turks, however, were by no means surprised, and received the invaders with a smart infantry fire from the slopes above the cove, while what cannon they possessed played upon the boats and the infantry crossing the flats. Yolchine, however, ordered his men to lie down in the mud, and, while maintaining a skirmishing fire, await the arrival of further boat-loads, which slowly but steadily arrived one by one. When enough had collected Yolchine ordered his men to fix bayonets, and charged the Turks, who, after firing a volley, slowly retired up the slopes. From that time until three o'clock in the afternoon boat-load after boat-load of Russians, infantry, Cossacks, and finally field artillery, crossed the river, notwithstanding a heavy shell fire from the Turks, who, as our illustration depicts, succeeded in sinking a few boats. A Turkish monitor at one time was observed approaching Sistova, and had it persevered she might have done incalculable damage. Owing to some unknown cause, however,—probably the fear of torpedoes—she suddenly turned tail, and retired down the stream. In the mean time the Russian batteries were far from idle, and busily shelled the Turkish positions, until, overpowered by numbers, the Turks retired, leaving the bank and Sistova completely in the hands of the Russians. The Grand Duke Nicholas himself crossed in the afternoon, and by the evening nearly the whole of the Eighth Army Corps had passed the river, and preparations were at once begun to throw an iron pontoon bridge across the river, on which the main body might pass. The number of killed and wounded, though numbering about 1,000, was less than might have been expected considering the mark offered by the Russian boats, and by the columns crossing the open marshy flats.

ON THE ROAD TO THE FRONT

ONE of our sketches represents our artist and the correspondent of the Daily News journeying to the front with their travelling equipment, which was so amusingly described by Mr. Forbes in a recent letter. The chief feature is the carriage which, covered with leather, and fitted with sundry wells, makes a sufficient habitation for two men who can pack tightly and can give and take one with the other. By a simple arrangement the floor becomes at night a bed place, the cushions doing duty for a mattress, and while in wet weather there is protection from the tilt of the waggon, on fine nights the front of this moveable bedchamber is open. In the wells is an assortment of tinned provisions, and a cooking apparatus of extreme simplicity, for no inns were to be expected on the other side of the river. Behind the waggon is a covered receptacle for luggage, and cunningly contrived on the roof is a canvas house, which, by undoing a couple of buckles, unrolls itself, a wide spread of canvas roofing, with two poles in the centre, thus affording, when fixed, a pleasant canvas drawing-room. "What does one want more," Mr. Forbes asks, "than this for occupation by day, with a little table and a couple of stools, the waggon for a bedchamber, and for kitchen a hole in the turf on the side of the 'eligible modern residence?'"

"Carting the Soup Kitchen," depicts the transport of a portion of the Army Commissariat, and the sketch of the arrival of the first prisoners of war at Simnitza portrays a detachment of Turkish irregulars and Bashi-Bazooks, who had been captured by the advance line of the Russians. Some of the prisoners looked defiant, ruffianly, splendid fellows, while others appeared downcast and half-starved.

WITH THE TURKS—THE CAMP OF SHUMLA

SHUMLA is one of the strongest fortified positions in Eastern Bulgaria, and the entrenched camp which has been established there by reason of its geographical situation and strategical value, resulting from great natural strength, ranks among the most important military positions of the Turks. It is situated a little to the southward of the railway from Rustchuk to Varna, and the town itself lies on the eastern slope of the mountain spur, separated from the Balkan range by the valley of the Killy or Akili-Kamchik. The height rises about 800 feet above the valley, and forms a kind of plateau or top, the ascent being at first steep, often almost perpendicular, and then gradually changing slopes partly on to the plain. According to a correspondent of The Times, the fortifications of the entrenched camp consist of nine large independent works, with several smaller ones, and batteries between which encircle the town at a distance from five to seven miles, ending on the one side on the steep impervious heights of Steulsa, and on the other on the heights of Cingal. The main works are provided with extensive traverses, and are adapted for infantry defence, and are incapable of being taken by storm, but are made of earth. They are armed with about 200 guns, including forty Krupp cannon. The smaller batteries last month were unarmed, but were to be provided with field batteries in case of need. The town itself of Shumla does not possess the slightest power of resistance, being neither surrounded by a wall, ditch, nor towers. The area, bounded by the line of works on the one hand and the steep ascent to the plateau on the other, and which is absolutely guarded from all observation from without, is able to shelter an army of more than 150,000 men. At the present moment about 60,000 troops are in the camp, and the head-quarters of the Turkish army, under Abd-ul-Kerim Pasha, the Commander-in-Chief or Serdar Ekrem, have been fixed there. Four times—in 1774, 1810, 1828, and 1829—have the Russians attacked Shumla without success. Whether they will be more fortunate in 1877 remains to be seen. There is luck, they say, in odd numbers.

WITH HOBART PASHA—THE TURKISH FLEET OFF SULINA

THE Sulina mouth of the Danube is one of the lower branches of that river, and although it is one of the smallest outlets, the channel there over the bar is deeper than that of the other mouths, as, owing to recent improvements, it has been deepened from eight to ten feet to twenty-one feet. Consequently it is now a harbour of the first class, is greatly frequented by shipping, and during the present war has been the chief naval station of the Turkish fleet under Hobart Pasha. It was here also that the Russians made their unsuccessful torpedo attack upon the Turkish ironclads, which was frustrated by the means of defence adopted by Hobart Pasha, namely a cordon of boats connected together by a chain. Of this we gave an illustration in No. 394.

"LITTLE WISDOM"

SOME wit at the end of the last century declared that nobody could possibly be so wise as Lord Thurlow looked, and this dictum would appear to apply to the dignified little lady in Miss Brooks' picture, who seems, judging from her outside aspect, to be endowed with a double portion of that quality which is usually associated with the goddess Minerva. So stately and self-possessed is she that she looks as if she were capable, despite her tender years, of becoming housekeeper to a Duke, or of sitting as a member of the School Board, or of superintending a Reformatory. Perhaps, however, it is all outside show. Perhaps she is like Coleridge's man of venerable aspect, who seemed the quintessence of wisdom so long as he held his tongue, but displayed his real nature when the arrival of the dumplings caused him to exclaim, "Them's the jockeys for me." Perhaps "Little Wisdom" is, in reality, a romp and a tomboy.

NOTE.—Mr. T. Jones Barker's picture of "The Balaclava Charge," now exhibiting at the Danish Gallery, 142, New Bond Street, was not in last year's Royal Academy Exhibition, as stated by us, having only been finished about seven weeks ago.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.—Home politics outside Parliament have been remarkably stagnant during the past week, and there is scarcely anything worth recording beyond the fact that Mr. Gladstone has had a narrow escape of being run over by a reckless cab-driver, and that Mr. Ward Hunt is still very unwell. The Bishop of Manchester the other day delivered himself of a long speech on the Eastern Question, blaming the Government for sending the fleet to Besika Bay, and declaring that they were on the brink of a war which they would be less able to justify than any. He never could see why we could not have accepted the Berlin Memorandum, which was a better and more stringent document than the feeble Andrassy Note to which we had agreed. —The Conservative Associations of Manchester have presented Sir Stafford Northcote with a beautifully illuminated album, and an address expressive of their confidence in the policy of the Government.—On Thursday the Daily News announced that rumours prevailed, "in quarters which are usually well informed," that Lord Beaconsfield was about to resign the Premiership. The Daily News adds, that "although this report is probably premature, yet we believe that his lordship is anxious to retire from office as soon as the state of public business will enable him to take that step, his health having been for some time past in an unsatisfactory condition."

THE VOLUNTEERS AT WIMBLEDON.—The eighteenth meeting of the National Rifle Association is now being held at Wimbledon. On Saturday some 1,300 or 1,400 volunteers arrived in camp, and they slept comfortably under canvas, although the night was very cold. On Sunday morning, however, rain began to fall, and continued all day with little intermission, a circumstance which perhaps accounts for the thin attendance at the religious services in camp. The weather, however, cleared on Monday, though a strong wind and changeable light interfered in some degree with the shooting some good scores were made. On Tuesday the thermometer went up suddenly from 67° to 74° in the shade and 132° in the sun, but there was still a great deal too much wind to suit the marksmen. The first stage for the Queen's Prize was commenced, and the Daily Telegraph Prizes were shot for. On Wednesday, when the wind was more favourable, the chief events were the second stage of the Queen's Prize, and the contest for the Alexandra Prize, and there was plenty of cracking at the Running Deer, for which, by the bye, there is some talk of substituting a "Bounding Tiger." The Council have been closely investigating statements affecting the integrity of certain markers, and the possibility of connivance between them and competitors, in falsifying the scores. Strict watch has been set, not only at Wimbledon but elsewhere, on the actions of the suspected persons; and a successful shot who has managed twice to get into the first 60 for the Queen's Prize, and thrice into the first 300, was detected at the last Edinburgh meeting in an act of bribery. The result is that he has been compelled to leave the London regiment of which he was a member; and orders have been given to the officials attending at the several entries not to accept his name or money. The total number in camp on Monday was 3,113; more than half of whom were volunteers, and the regulations with regard to uniforms are more generally observed than was the case last year. Lord and Lady Wharncliffe, who took up their residence at the Cottage on Saturday, are making active preparations for private theatricals and practice for the athletic sports on the last day of the meeting.

The Royal Review.——A force of about 15,000 men was reviewed by Her Majesty in the Great Park, Windsor, on Tuesday. The troops, who had marched from Aldershot the previous day, and encamped for the night at Chobham and Ascot, looked remarkably well, and as "Queen's weather" prevailed throughout the day the display may be looked upon as a perfect success. The march past occupied about two hours, and was witnessed by an immense crowd of spectators.

The Child Suicide.—A boy, aged twelve, last week hung himself in the Infirmary of Christ's Hospital, and a coroner's jury have declared that the act was committed in a fit of temporary insanity. There has been much talk about the affair since, and the only consolation we can gather is that there will probably be a searching inquiry into, and possibly a reform of the system of monitorial surveillance and "fagging" which seems to be in vogue in Newgate Street. What makes such an inquiry all the more necessary is the statement that although this is the only suicide which has actually occurred, another lad did, some three months since, attempt to take his own life. We fancy that the evidence of that lad would be especially valuable to those whose duty it will be to conduct the investigation.

Sir John Bennett's election as alderman of the ward of Cheap is to be disputed by the Court of Aldermen, who have, it seems, the power of putting a veto upon it. It will be remembered that Sir John polled the extremely narrow majority of 334 to Mr. Waddell's 333, and that on the scrutiny it was shown that no fewer than eight of his supporters had voted as "occupiers" of a single apartment at 61, Cheapside. The opinion of the Recorder was that "a majority secured by such a device cannot be creditable;" but Sir John is satisfied with it, and is highly indignant that his position should be in any way disputed. He threatens that resistance to his election may bring about a reform of "the only unreformed corporation."

A Tiger Hunt in England.——On Monday a fine tigress which was being conveyed by rail from London to Liverpool broke open its carriage en route, and escaped. As soon as its absence was discovered the telegraph was set to work, and two old Indian officers of the 106th Regiment, quartered at Weedon, took a firing party down the line on a pilot engine in pursuit, and they found her near Buckby Bank. A number of shots appear to have been fired with little effect; but at last one made her "bound several feet into the air." After falling she growled furiously, and as the ammunition of the party was by this time exhausted, it is just possible that the tigress might have begun to chase the engine had it not been for the opportune appearance of a Mr. Judkins with another rifle, a few shots from which finished the business. The incident was fortunately only novel and exciting; but it might have been tragic, and Mr. Jamrach should see to it that his pets are more carefully secured. Some time ago, if we remember rightly, a snake escaped from his premises, but was fortunately recaptured without doing harm to anyone. Such may not always be the case, and we should certainly strongly object to live in the vicinity of Mr. Jamrach's collection.

London Mortality again increased slightly, and last week 1,322 deaths were registered against 1,300 during the previous seven days, being 72 below the average, and at the rate of 19·5 per 1,000. There were 23 from small-pox (a decrease of 11), 44 from measles, 18 from scarlet fever (a decline of 6), 9 from diphtheria (an increase of 3), 35 from whooping-cough (an increase of 7), 19 from different kinds of fever (a decline of 7), and 96 from diarrhœa, of which 80 were children under one year of age; but though this number exceeded that of the previous week by 46, the deaths were 34 below the average. Deaths referring to diseases of the respiratory organs numbered 144, and were 15 below the average. Different forms of violence caused 56 deaths, of which 50 were the result of accident or negligence. There were 2,220 births registered against 2,291 during the previous week, being 40 below the average. The registered duration of sunshine last week was 46·0 hours out of the 114·9 hours that the sun was above the horizon. The mean temperature was 58·2 deg., or 3·2 deg. below the average.

Miscellaneous.——Sir Stafford Northcote has consented to become a candidate for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University. —Mr. de Morgan has had some correspondence with the First Commissioner of Works in relation to the Duke of Cambridge's preserves in Richmond Park. His cool request that the head keeper should be ordered to conduct him through the inclosures in order that he may assure himself of the various "illegal" practices is politely refused, and he is as politely referred to the Solicitor to the Treasury, "who will afford every facility for the speedy determination of any claims which he may make at law."—Kensington House was not sold last week. The bidding for it was very languid, and the auctioneer was obliged to announce that 165,000*l*. was not enough for it, and that those who wished to know what the reserve price was might call next day at his office, though he would not promise to put anything in writing.—The fifty-third anniversary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was held on Tuesday at St. James's Hall, Lord Harrowby presiding. Professor Ruskin made a telling speech, saying that he thought the society had worked too much in the police courts and not enough in the field and cottage garden. The prizes to children for essays on kindness to animals were distributed on the following day by Princess Christian.—The eighth annual City flower show was held on Tuesday in the gardens of Finsbury Circus, the prizes being distributed by the Duchess of Westminster.—Four lives were lost on Monday night in a fire which broke out in Little Britain. The escape men made several gallant but unsuccessful attempts to save the inmates of the burning house—two women and two children, who were buried in the ruins by the sudden fall of the roof.—The Rotunda Theatre at Liverpool has been completely destroyed by fire. The damage is estimated at 40,000*l*., and the insurance is only for 14,000*l*.—On Monday the timber roof of a church at Sunderland was blown in by a sudden gust of wind, and some men who were at work within the building were severely hurt. —On Saturday a man was killed by the fall of a girder of a railway bridge which was being placed in position across the Seven Sisters' Road at Finsbury Park Station.

THEATRES

The continual extension of the District Railway, by which this line is brought more and more into communication with the suburbs and environs of London, reminds us of the great change which has come over the habits of playgoers consequent upon the enormously increased facilities for getting to and fro. The District line, running from the Mansion House to South Kensington, or rather Gloucester Road, and thence diverging in so many different directions, is above all the playgoers' line. Two-thirds of the most important theatres in London lie within a few minutes' walk of two of its stations; while the Court Theatre at Chelsea and the Royal Aquarium Theatre at Westminster could hardly have existed but for the fact of each having a station opposite its doors. Within the last few weeks this railway has been extended to Richmond by way of the populous districts of Hammersmith and Turnham Green; and a new line, now completed from Earl's Court to Acton, will next month bring important new neighbourhoods on the west and north-west sides of London into direct communication with the Strand, besides completing a junction with the Midland Railway. It is owing in great measure to such improvements in locomotion and the general custom of running late trains, that going to a play or to an opera has become more easy for residents in distant environs than it was for dwellers in the nearest suburbs twenty or thirty years ago.

Consequent upon this altered condition of things we have seen changes having a considerable influence upon dramatic art. Increased patronage has not only led to a very remarkable increase in the number of theatres, but has encouraged several managers to aim at a higher standard of perfection, and thus to set an example which cannot fail to exercise a beneficial influence upon the stage. It has been perceived that in so vast a circle of patronage there must exist a sufficient number of persons of cultivated taste to support a certain number of well-conducted theatres; and how quick these persons are to discover merit is shown by the brilliant success of Mr. Hare and his company at the Court Theatre—a house which had certainly no advantage either in prestige or in position. Whether the long runs which this almost inexhaustible supply of audiences also renders possible afford equal ground for congratulation is perhaps more open to question; though Mr. Thorne and Mr. James, who have this week appeared for the 800th time in Mr. Byron's Our Boys at the Vaudeville, are perfectly justified in continuing to perform a play which continues to amuse, and which in the present dearth of new pieces would not easily be replaced by one as attractive. Moderately long runs, however, are attended with advantages from the playgoer's point of view; for the effective production of most pieces requires an outlay of capital which it would be impossible to make remunerative if performances were limited—as they were in the case of even successful plays fifty years ago—to half a dozen or a dozen nights. A not less striking result of the tendency to confine the highest efforts in the way of dramatic art to one central neighbourhood is the sort of revolution which it has caused in our suburban theatres. Up to half a century ago theatres in the suburbs were, as a rule, small houses where prices of admission were comparatively high. Now they are generally enormous buildings, the best parts of which may be entered for a trifling sum. The general level of excellence of their entertainments is certainly not lower than it was; but, on the other hand, it was at one period less unusual to find distinguished actors performing at suburban houses. The fact is that the more educated playgoers now avail themselves of the improved facilities for going to the theatre, and do not as a rule patronise, unless it is at pantomime time, the houses of the suburbs. Hence these houses, admirably managed as some of them are, necessarily appeal to a humbler class. They depend mostly on the crowded localities in which they exist, and as low prices are an indispensable condition of their existence, it is only by their vast size that they can be made to hold a paying audience. In some respects this is a change to be regretted. Large theatres tend to encourage mere spectacular displays, and the finer qualities of acting are wasted upon an audience most of which is sitting at too great a distance from the stage to observe them. Besides this, short runs—with the single exception of the pantomimes—are so absolutely the rule at suburban houses that it is not to be expected that such large sums can be expended on their production as at the higher class of houses. Nor is this condition likely to undergo change. A very large house, which is compelled to depend chiefly on its own locality, necessarily exhausts in a short time the supply of audiences. The most satisfactory feature about the suburban houses is that they furnish the humbler classes with a cheap entertainment at their own doors, and one which is generally innocent enough. The unexceptional wholesome tendency of domestic drama in the suburbs is indeed as notorious as is the occasional habit of suburban audiences of applauding the virtuous heroine, and hooting at the villain, of the piece on purely moral as distinguished from æsthetic grounds.

Madame Chaumont's engagement at the Gaiety will terminate this week. This afternoon this accomplished actress is announced to appear in two pieces, and to sing some of her popular dramatic songs. On Monday the famous company of the Vaudeville Theatre will make their first appearance here in Le Procès Veauradieux.

An "entirely new and original comedy," entitled Flirtation, is to be produced at a morning performance at the Globe Theatre to-morrow. It is stated to be the work of "new authors." As new authors are just now much wanted, it is satisfactory to know that if the piece should prove acceptable to the audience its performance will add two names to the list of successful dramatists.

A new children's pantomime is announced to be produced at the Adelphi at an unusually early date. The title is Little Red Riding Hood, the author is the delightful writer who modestly concealed himself last season under the pseudonym of an "Old Boy," and the day fixed for the first performance is the 4th of August. The new harlequinade is to be arranged by Mr. Cormack, the new scenery is to be painted by Mr. Stafford Hall.

Drury Lane is to reopen for the autumn season on Saturday, September 15, when "a new and original romantic and realistic drama" is to be produced with scenery by Mr. Beverley.—Miss Lydia Thompson is about to return to the United States to fulfil professional engagements in that country.

Miss Glyn's Shakespearian Readings.——Miss Glyn began another of her excellent series of Shakespearian readings on Tuesday evening at 15, Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, Antony and Cleopatra being the play selected for that evening. Miss Glyn, with wise discrimination, chiefly confined herself to the principal scenes between the two lovers, and gave an admirable representation of the proud and haughty Mark Antony struggling in the toils of the Egyptian queen. Miss Glyn's well-known style, marked by unusual power, plainly shows the possibility of alternately depicting passion and pathos without that objectionable tendency to rant which mars the delivery of so many Shakespearian readers. Her clear, distinct utterance, and the delicate light and shade with which she marks the difference between the various characters make these recitals a genuine pleasure for all true lovers of Shakespeare who can thus enjoy his plays as he really wrote them, and not altered and cut about as a medium for scenic display and star acting. Miss Glyn was as happy with the lighter as with the sadder side of Cleopatra's character, and she rendered the small part of the clown who brings the fatal asp with especial humour, but her greatest success lay in the death scenes of Antony and Cleopatra. The series consist of seven readings, which take place on Tuesday evenings and Friday mornings. Macbeth was given yesterday, and Hamlet, The Merchant of Venice, Romeo and Juliet, Measure for Measure, and King John are announced for the succeeding representations.

PARLIAMENT

Mr. Whalley is following up with rapid strides the attempt already noted of making himself a centre of Parliamentary interest. In ordinary times the question hour has not been unacquainted with his presence and his voice; but since the discovery that "The Priest in Absolution" is actually an agency in English life, and that Mr. Whalley's fears of priestly influence, long laughed at, have sure foundation, he has grown simply irrepressible. His favourite times of appearance are in the first and last hours of the sitting, with various irruptions midway. Scarcely a day passes but he has one or more questions on the paper, the subjects varying from "The Priest in Absolution" to the Russians in Asia Minor. On Monday the former subject occupied his attention, when he brought under the notice of the House in general, and the Secretary to the Admiralty in particular, a statement which has appeared in Mayfair to the effect that two chaplains holding commissions in H.M.'s Navy are members of the Holy Cross Society. Mr. Whalley wanted to know whether these gentlemen were to be continued in their office, to which Mr. Egerton made the cautious reply that the allegation itself was not sufficient to ensure their dismissal, though the Admiralty regarded with disapproval any practices which had been declared to be contrary to the tenets of the Church of England. Mr. Whalley was moderately satisfied with this answer, and beyond occasional dashes-in during subsequent debates did not during the evening again obtrude himself on the notice of the House. On Tuesday, however, he had a grand field day, beginning the sitting with cross-examining the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the truth of a statement that the English fleet was about to join with the French fleet in interference in the war in the East, and winding up the sitting by rising to move a resolution for the disestablishment of the Church of England. As Mr. Whalley has informed the House, he has after due consideration been driven to the conclusion that the only way to stop the practices of which he complains is to disestablish the Church of England. It must, however, be admitted that twenty-five minutes to two in the morning, after a sitting which, with an interval of two hours, had lasted since two o'clock on the previous day, was not a suitable occasion for commencing a discussion on a subject of so much interest. Accordingly he was, apparently to his surprise, counted out, and the House laughingly dispersed. There is, indeed, save for their monotony, nothing more pleasant than these little encounters between Mr. Whalley and the House of Commons. Notwithstanding his pertinacity, and his occasional guiltiness of waste of time, Mr. Whalley is a general favourite in the House, and he accepts with such resignation the regular rebuffs with which he meets that it is impossible not to be sorry for him.

Some progress continues to be made in the business of the House, and the estimates may now be said to be in a forward condition; though in truth, seeing that we are within three weeks of the natural close of the Session, that is not saying much. The second reading of the South Africa Bill was agreed to after a debate in which Mr. Courtney, who seems to have got over his recent difficulty, showed at great length—firstly, why the Transvaal should not have been annexed; and secondly, why the particular Bill by which the proposal was sought to be completed ought not to be passed. Mr. Courtney made a good speech, and received the valuable support in debate of Sir Charles Dilke and other members. But he made a great mistake in dividing, as in the result he secured a decisive victory for the Ministerial policy, indicated by the fact that only 19 voted against the second reading, whilst 81 were opposed. The division took place unexpectedly early, in full dinner hour, the Ministerial forces having been dispersed under the impression that the division would not be taken till after dinner. Had the division been taken later, it is probable that, whilst Mr. Courtney might have had a few more votes, the Government would have brought together an overwhelming force.

The morning sitting on Tuesday was given up wholly to educational topics, a subject which though important, does not afford opportunities for exhilarating conversation. Several members who take an interest in education seized the opportunity of bringing forward their views, Mr. Samuelson, who had precedence pressing to a division his resolution which condemned the English Education Code on the ground that it requires all students attending colleges and receiving Government aid to reside within such colleges. There was a pretty strong feeling in the House that there was something in this objection, which received the support of Mr. Forster, and on a division it was rejected only by 121 votes against 78. After this came a deluge of notices of motion, and it appeared probable that as has often happened to other Ministers, Lord Sandon would see the morning pass away without obtaining a single vote. There was in some quarters a conviction that the noble lord rather deserved such a fate, as he had adroitly attempted at the outset to take the pas of private members by making his statement before going into Committee. According to the rules of debate notices of motion relating to any particular subject precede the motion that the House shall go into Committee. As soon as the House gets into Committee the Minister in charge of the particular business makes his annual statement if he be introducing estimates. Lord Sandon wanted to make his statement first, leaving the notices of motion to take their chance afterwards. He had even risen to commence when he was stopped, and was fain to be content with following the ordinary course. As it was, private members fully enjoyed their privilege, talking for four hours to their hearts' content, and leaving the Minister of Education something less than half an hour, if he desired to get any votes. Lord Sandon sacrificed his speech to his pecuniary necessities, and confining the observations for which he is accustomed to take an hour and a half to a space of twenty-five minutes, he was rewarded by getting several votes through.

Wednesday's sitting was chiefly occupied by Scotch members in discussing a Bill of Mr. M'Laren's, the object of which was to abolish the Church Assessments in Scotland. The fate of the measure was a foregone conclusion, and it was thrown out by 204 to 143.

Church News

The Bible in School.——On Saturday about 5,000 Board School children of London attended a fête at the Crystal Palace, and 4,000 Bibles and Testaments, given by Mr. Peek and the Religious Tract Society, were distributed as prizes for proficiency in Scripture knowledge. Forty-three of these were presented to the winners by Lord Sandon, and the first who went up to his lordship was a blind girl, the best in her class in the second standard at a vivâ voce examination. Her prize was printed in the raised characters used in books for the blind. Lord Sandon made an eloquent speech praising the action of the London School Board in giving the rudiments of Christianity to the people, and expressing a hope that other school boards in all parts of the kingdom would soon follow the good example. His lordship was afterwards presented with a Bible by Dr. Manning on behalf of the Religious Tract Society. Some of the answers given in the competitive examination are curious on account of their irrelevancy or incorrectness. Thus, Elijah is said to have met his death by falling off a post and breaking his neck; the woman of Canaan is described as "a good woman who lived in Canaan, and had something the matter with her." One child, apparently unable to answer a question relating to Christ's betrayal and crucifixion, gives instead a long account of His burial and resurrection. Another stumbles over a well-known text as follows: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? it is hard to kick against a brick." A third speaks of Christ's having enough power to heal all the Jews and some to spare for the Gentiles; and a fourth, anxious to display her erudition, overleaps herself by saying that "there is rather an uncertainty" as to how Elijah was fed at the brook Cherith, as three letters in the Hebrew language, r-v-n, mean either raven or Arab.

The Pan-Presbyterian Council.——The sittings of this Council were opened on Tuesday last week with a sermon by Dr. Flin in St. Giles's Cathedral, Edinburgh, followed by a public reception of the delegates by the citizens of Edinburgh in the Museum of Science and Art, an address of welcome being read by Lord Balfour of Burleigh. Amongst the subjects dealt with at the subsequent meetings were "The Harmony of the Reformed Confessions," "The General Principles of Presbyterianism," "The Relations of Presbyterianism to the Wants and Tendencies of the Day," "The Churchliness of Calvinism," "The Influence of Presbyteryianism in the United States," "The Scriptural Character and Simplicity of Presbyterianism," "Discoveries in Science and Philosophy," "The Underlying Principles of Infidelity," "Spiritual Life," "The Value of the Sabbath," "Intemperance as a Hindrance to Religion" (one speaker stating that there was an average of 500,000 habitual drunkards in the United States of America, of whom 50,000 went to drunkards' graves every year), and "The Position of Some of the Continental Churches." At the closing sitting on Tuesday last "Presbyterian Literature and the Use of the Press" was discussed, and a committee was appointed to inquire as to the available materials for a general Presbyterian History; an address to the Queen was adopted, and thanks voted to the City of Edinburgh for its hospitality. The next meeting of the Council is to be held in Philadelphia in September, 1880.

The Holy Cross Society.——It is some comfort to notice how firmly Convocation has set its foot down upon "The Priest in Absolution," though we fear that it is too much to expect that its unequivocal condemnation will have much effect upon the members of the Society of the Holy Cross, whom the Primate so justly stigmatises as conspiring against the doctrine, discipline, and practices of the Reformed Church of England. The Society have promised "in deference to the desire expressed by the Archbishop of Canterbury" to issue no more copies of the book; but the very manner in which they have done this, coupled with their casuistic defence of the practice of Confession, shows that there is no true penitence for their fault, and justifies the Bishop of London's declaration that the "Society had neither repudiated nor withdrawn the book from circulation."—Allusion was made to the subject in several places of worship last Sunday. The Bishop of Manchester preaching at Blackburn referred to the rumour that he had been connected with the Society and the book, and said that there was no truth in the statement. He was utterly opposed to both the one and the other. The Rev. J. Knox-Little, preaching at St. Alban's, Manchester, protested against the "vile calumnies" circulated against the Society of the Holy Cross, which was a good and noble society, comprising men whose lives were directed to the attainment of the highest and purest ends. He fully intended to continue the practice of Confession, and if any of his people thought that his teaching was in any way corrupting or pernicious he would resign the rectory of St. Alban's. The most outspoken defender of the cause as yet, has been the Rev. C. F. Lowder, vicar of St. Peter's, London Docks, a member of the Society, who preached at St. Mary the Virgin's, Primrose Hill, of which the Rev. C. J. Fuller, another member of the Society, is the "priest in charge." Mr. Lowder took his text from Nehemiah's description of the rebuilding of the Temple, each workman having a weapon ready to hand, and drew a parallel between the restoration of the Temple and the restoration of the Catholic Faith in England at the present day. They had, he said, fought for the faith of the Church, and had preserved it. The fight for ritual was also, he hoped, nearly won; but the hardest work was that still before them. The great doctrine of repentance, and of absolution, of the great gift which Jesus Christ had given to his Church for the reconciliation of sinners, had now become the subject of attack; and as the enemy was upon them on every side the trumpet must be sounded, and faithful Catholics must gather together. Though the clergy were the objects of the attack the laity must come forward in defence of their freedom and liberty to come to God's priest, according to Christ's ordinance, for the blessing of absolution; they must defend the doctrine in love and charity towards their persecutors, and towards those who were unconscious of the wickedness of their acts. Let them work, and fight, and contend for the faith; and let those who valued the great blessing of confession and absolution, and who had found it a benefit to their own souls, contend for it in charity and love against those who blasphemed and those who had not yet learned to feel the need of it.—The Church Association announce an anti-confessional meeting in Exeter Hall on Friday next.

Various.——The Rev. Dr. Thorold was last Saturday duly elected to the vacant See of Rochester. The Record says that it is quite erroneous to suppose that the Dean and Chapter proceeded to elect in obedience to the Royal congé d'élire and Letters Missive, after solemn prayer for guidance in their choice. "The prayer for the newly elected Bishop was offered after the First Lesson, immediately upon the announcement of the election by the chapter clerk. The election itself, in the Chapter House, was preceded by no such prayer as is commonly supposed to give the character of unreality or mockery to the election by petition for Divine guidance in the case of a foregone conclusion."—The Bishop of Lincoln has written to one of his clergy, severely rebuking him for forwarding a petition in favour of unfermented wine at the Holy Communion. He declares that in their present frame of mind the petitioners are not fit to receive the Sacrament at all, as in their pharisaical self-conceit they set up their private opinions against the universal practise of 1,800 years!—The same prelate has spoken in no uncertain tones upon the Burial Question. He thinks it childish to suppose that Protestant Dissenters or Christians would gain anything by the opening of our churchyards; he points out that Romanists, Socinians, Secularists, Mormonites, and Infidels have an equal claim for admission "as citizens," and declares that he thinks too well of "our Protestant Nonconformist brethren" to believe them capable of making common cause with the Romanist and the Infidel against all that ought to be most dear to Englishmen and Christians.—The Church Association have withdrawn their appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench in the case of the Rev. T. P. Dale, vicar of St. Vedast, Foster Lane. The Rev. A. Tooth has also appealed under the same conditions as Mr. Dale did, and the case was to come on yesterday (Friday) for hearing.—The South London Observer announces that the Primate has nominated the Rev. Crauford Tait, his son and chaplain, to be assistant curate at St. James's, Hatcham.—According to the Rock, the three Misses Johnson, members of Mr. Ridsdale's Church at Folkestone, have gone over to the Church of Rome. These ladies endowed the church, gave the "altar," and subscribed 500*l.* towards the parsonage and schools.—The Sunday School Union is about to organise a national subscription for a memorial statue of Robert Raikes, the founder of the Sunday School system, to be erected in Gloucester, his native city.

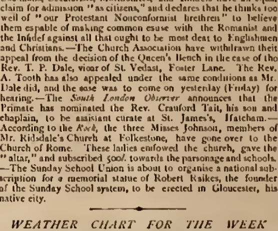
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

July 5th to July 11th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——We have now had a week of changeable weather. It commenced with a rather cloudy unsettled state of the sky, and the barometer falling a little; and for three days we had a series of thunderstorms, rain, and heavy hail showers, which, however, were very local. Thus the heavy showers of hail which fell over the City and West End on Friday and Saturday, the 6th and 7th, were scarcely felt at all in Brixton, whence, however, masses of heavy cloud were seen hanging over London, with vivid flashes of lightning shooting from them. The nights of Friday and Saturday, the 6th and 7th, were exceedingly cool, the wind being light from north-west, and the sky clear. On the first of the two, or, rather, during the early hours of Saturday, the 7th instant, the shade thermometer fell to 42°, and the grass thermometer to 33°, while on the following morning they sank to 41° and 32° (freezing point) respectively. Since that date the weather has been warmer and finer. The barometer was highest (30.33 inches) on Monday, the 9th instant; lowest (29.88 inches) on Thursday, the 5th instant; range, 0.45 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (78°) on Tuesday afternoon, the 10th instant; lowest (41°) on Sunday morning, the 8th instant; range, 37°. The lowest on the grass was 32°, as above stated. Rainfall: Total fall, 0.29 inch; greatest fall, 0.20 inch, on Thursday, the 5th instant.

The Israelite Community in New York are in a great state of indignation. One of the hotels at Saratoga—the Transatlantic Brighton—has formally announced its intention to receive no Jews this season, but this attempt to revive the proscription of the Middle Ages is almost universally condemned by sensible Christians. Personal pique is supposed to be the real cause of this intolerance.

M. Thiers' Art Collection has been entirely reconstituted, and is now nearly equal to its original condition before the Communists devastated the house in the Rue St. Georges. The library was easily re-arranged, as M. Thiers does not care for rare and beautifully bound editions, but regards books solely as means of gaining information, and as aids to his work, and thus prefers them in common binding, the pages being scribbled over with marginal remarks. His artistic treasures gave him more trouble, and although nearly all the Florentine bronzes and old Italian paintings were recovered, in many cases the ex-President has been obliged to put up with copies of the originals he formerly possessed. The china and porcelain Madame Thiers herself has superintended, and she has succeeded in collecting all the scattered pieces of an old Sèvres dinner-service, each plate worth 2*l.* or 3*l.*, and the set was used at the dinner given to celebrate M. Thiers' eightieth birthday.

A well-known German Novelist, Frederick William Hacklander, died last week at Munich, aged 61. His first work was written at the age of 15.

Christ's Hospital.——Speech Day has been fixed for July 18th. The proceedings will commence at two P.M. punctually, and the Lord Mayor has kindly consented to distribute the prizes.

The Colorado Beetle has made its appearance in Ireland, where a gentleman found a specimen crawling along a rope from a Liverpool vessel on to one of the Dublin quays.

M. Rubinstein's Opera, "Nero," is to be brought out next winter at the Paris Théâtre Italien, and the composer himself will superintend its production. Nero, by the way, was "promised" to a London audience this season.

A Portuguese Expedition to Africa started on Saturday for St. Paul de Loanda. The travellers will explore the territory between the provinces of Angola and Mozambique, and will study the relations between the valleys of the Zaire and the Zambesi.

The Site of the Ancient City of Sybaris in Catania, Southern Italy, is to be explored this autumn under Government enterprise. Sybaris, famed for its habits of luxury, which gave rise to the term Sybarite, was destroyed by the Crotonians about 510 B.C.

The Kentish Hop Harvest will be very poor this year. Round Canterbury it is believed that not more than one-third of a crop will be gathered in half of the district. On the other half, however, an average growth is expected if fine weather continue.

The Contest for the Dunmow Flitch of Bacon takes place on the 23rd inst. in Dunmow Town Hall, and the decision will be given by a jury of bachelors and spinsters. Two couples will compete for the prize, one of whom, Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, of Hull, obtained the flitch on the last occasion.

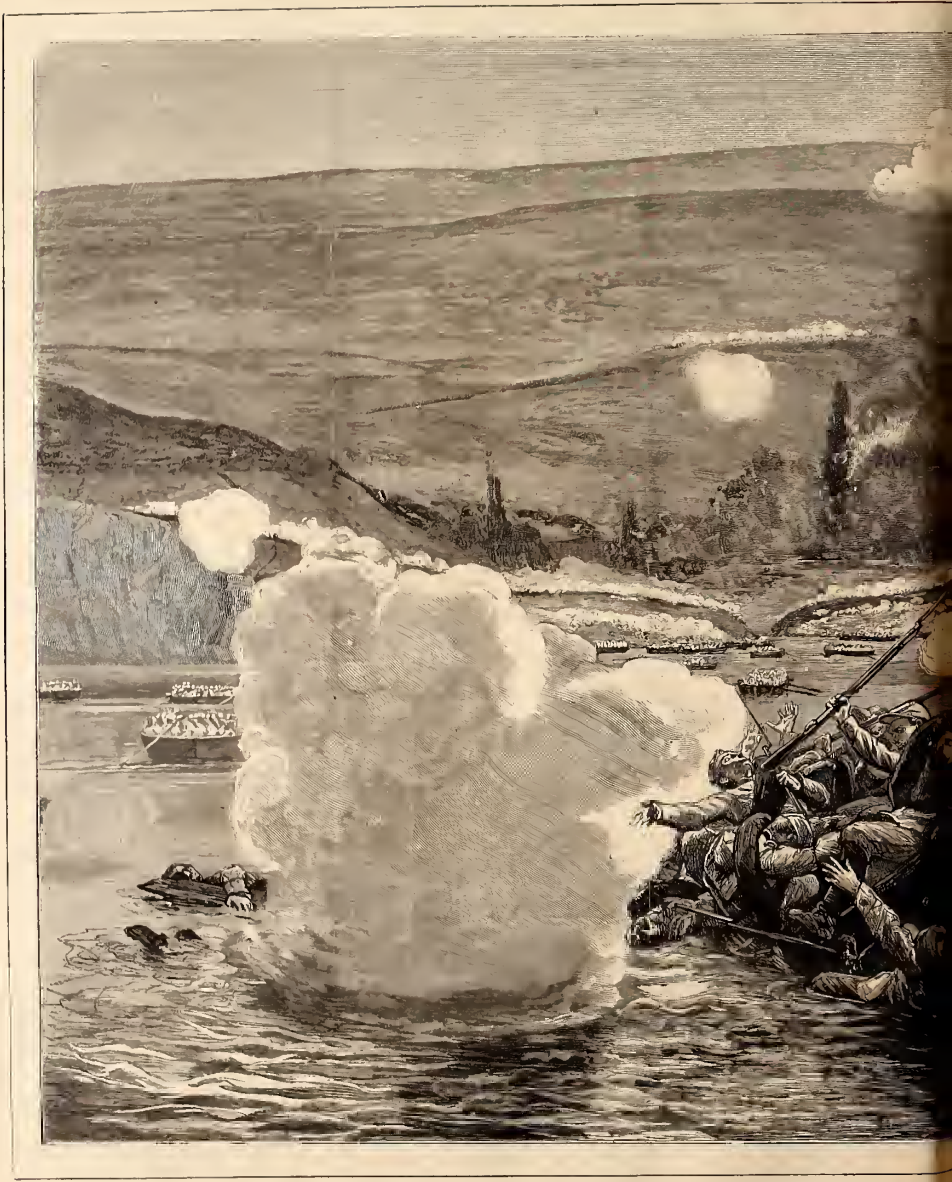
The Large Number of Russian Prisoners reported by Mussulman journals to be taken by the Turks, is believed by Moslem wiseacres to be due to a cunning stroke of Muscovite diplomacy. An old Mohammedan declared to the Constantinople correspondent of the Paris Temps that the Russians, "fertile in diabolical inventions," knew the Turks to be hard pushed for provisions for their own army, and therefore ordered many of their men to allow themselves to be made prisoners in order that the Moslems might be reduced to greater straits and distress by having to feed so many additional mouths.

The National Portrait Gallery has received thirty-two donations during the past year. These include portraits of Sir Francis Burdett, Bart., painted by Sir Martin Archer Shee, R.A., of Sir Edwin Landseer, by Sir Francis Grant, of Miss O'Neill, afterwards Lady Becher, by J. Masquerier, of Lord Hardinge, by Sir Francis Grant, and various judges and other eminent members of the legal profession which recently hung on the walls of the hall and dining-room of Serjeants' Inn. The donations also include three medallions of Queen Mary, Philip II. of Spain, and Queen Elizabeth, by Mr. George Scharf. The number of visitors to the Gallery in 1876 was 108,252, which exceeded the number in any previous year.

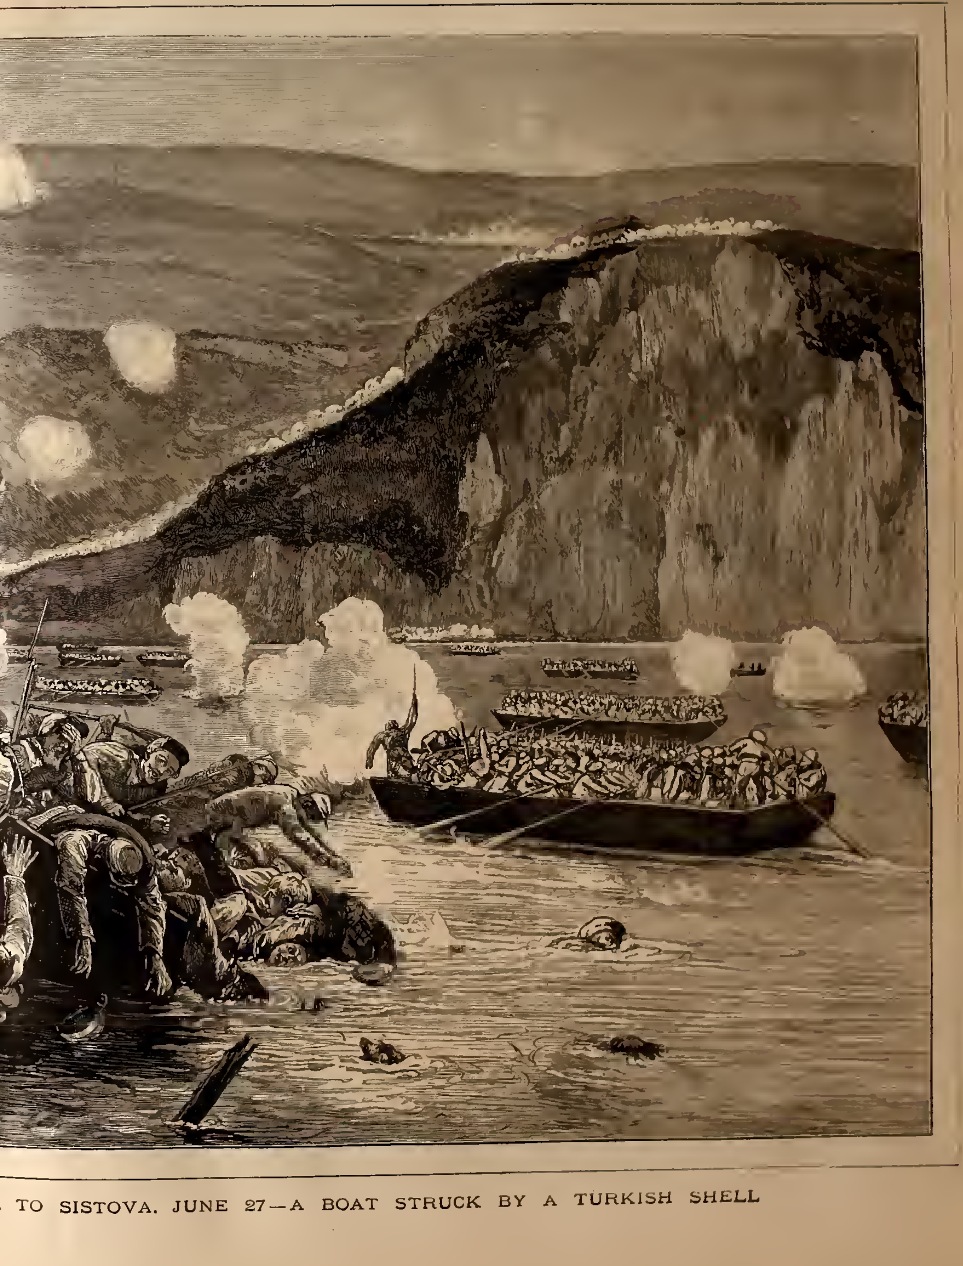
The Adoption of a Rat by a Cat is recorded by the Live Stock Journal. The cat was known in the neighbourhood as a most determined ratter, and had just killed six rats, which were believed to be the father, mother, and brothers of the one she had determined to adopt. This one she brought to her nest instead of killing it. The rat had been five days with the cat and her two kittens, and must have received nourishment from her, as it could not move away to get other food. Another strange case of adoption is also published by the same journal. In this instance three young starlings are being fed on grain by a pair of flying pigeons, while they also receive insectivorous food from their parents. The pigeons once had a nest in the same box as the starlings, which may account for this strange freak of natural adoption.

A Famine of Fowls is threatened in Assam. A "Starved Out Planter" writes to the Calcutta Englishman that the cause of the scarcity is said to be due to the powerful interest of a native high priest. This holy man has interdicted the breeding of fowls, threatening those who are disobedient to his command with his heavy displeasure in this world, and eternal perdition in the next. In the meantime he levies fines on all whom he suspects to be offenders. The "Starved Out Planter" sees no remedy for this terrible fowl famine but the interference of Government. "It is to be hoped that strict inquiries will be instituted by the authorities, and a quiet but firm intimation sent to the Aonhati Gokhain (the priest) that he is not acting in accordance with the views of the Government in thus interfering with the legitimate rights of the people." So writes the planter to the Englishman. We wonder what the Government will be asked to do next? Fowl-breeding or eating may be a legitimate right of Europeans and natives in India, but in the present state of the Imperial finances, it will hardly do to send an expedition into Assam to see that it is not interfered with.

The Paris 1878 Exhibition is fast getting into working order, and the demands for space from French exhibitors alone will probably not be under 35,000, while the number in 1867 was not more than 19,000. Germany is the only country which will not contribute, but other countries will be so well represented that the space allotted will not be sufficient, and numerous annexes are to be built. The English section will probably be the first completed, and will be much admired for its handsome façade. Close by will be the Dutch, Belgian, Swedish and Norwegian, Austrian and Russian sections, the Italian and Portuguese pavilions, with their respective façades of white marble and Spanish design, and the Grecian annexe, containing recent antiquarian discoveries. Close to the Ecole Militaire will be a group of architecture of different nations, such as the Louvain belfry, an old Amsterdam house and Dutch fortifications, a Swiss châlet, the turret of Gustave Wasa's house from Norway, Pericles' house restored from Greece, portions of a Turkish palace, the Palace of St. Mark at Venice, the palace at Lahore, and the Houses of Parliament, a china tower from Japan, a Chinese house, the gilded dome of the Teheran Palace, a cottage covered with feathers from the shores of the Orenoque, Brazil, and an Egyptian temple. In the Fine Arts collection only works executed since 1867 will be admitted, and the pictures will be grouped according to the nationality of the artists. Catalogues will be provided for each separate section of the Exhibition. A cattle and horse show will be held during the Exhibition on the Esplanade des Invalides.



WITH THE RUSSIANS: CROSSING THE DANUBE FROM SIMNITZ



TO SISTOVA. JUNE 27—A BOAT STRUCK BY A TURKISH SHELL

FOREIGN

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The Russians are making good their advance into Bulgaria, and the report of the capture of Tirnova has only turned out to be premature, as that important town was entered by the Russians, under General Gourka, on Saturday, and Prince Tcherkasski is now established in the ancient capital of the Bulgarian Czars. The taking of the town is looked upon by the Russians as a brilliant feat of arms, as the garrison, which numbered 3,000 Nizams and a large number of Redifs, were surprised and driven out of the town, leaving their camp and ammunition in the hands of the Russians. As usual the Christians welcomed the invaders with a religious procession, and sang a Te Deum in their honour. Biela also has been occupied, as the Turks, contented with repulsing the Russians at the bridge-head on the Jantra, evacuated that town on the 5th inst. The Russians are now calculated to have 120,000 men across the river, but nevertheless are advancing with great caution, and adopt the German method of invasion by always sending cavalry vedettes in front to reconnoitre and scour the country, and see that all is safe for the main body to follow. At present the invading army from Simnitza is divided into three principal columns, one of which is marching to Tirnova, a second to Selvi, and a third have entered Plevna, which, however, the Turks under Atif Pasha claim to have retaken. The Russians are anxious to advance upon Rustchuk and Shumla, but have first decided to wait for reinforcements, which, owing to the limited means of crossing the Danube afforded by the one bridge at Simnitza, are necessarily slow to arrive. From the Dobrudscha army we hear very little beyond that General Zimmerman appears to be concentrating his troops prior to attacking the line of Turkish defence and investing Kustendjie.

As for the Turks, at present they are acting wholly on the defensive, and from Sistova to Tirnova on the one side, and Matchin to Kustendjie on the other side of the quadrilateral, do not as yet seem to have made any serious stand against the advance of the Russians. Whether this is owing to supineness, to incapacity, or to some deeply-laid scheme is unknown, beyond that, when the Sultan, alarmed at the Muscovite successes, telegraphed to Abd-ul-Kerim to know why he and his 300,000 men had not prevented the passage of the river, the Serdar Ekrem replied that he had a plan by which not one of the Russians would recross the river alive. Abd-ul-Hamid, however, somewhat distrusting the efficacy of such a "plan," at once dispatched Redif Pasha to Shumla to overhaul it, and Abd-ul-Kerim has since received peremptory orders to make a general advance. The main features of the Turkish line of action are evidently to follow out the late Duke of Wellington's mode of fighting, and by retiring behind their defences, weary out the invaders by harassing sorties and small battles. There is a lingering hope also that the Russians may make the same mistake in Europe as they have done in Asia, and by dividing their columns into too many portions render them individually weak to resist a combined attack. The Grand Duke Nicholas, however, is far too cautious a man to commit any such error. A defeat in Asia is a comparatively trifling matter, but a serious repulse in Europe, where the eyes of half-a-dozen nations, hostile and neutral, are anxiously watching every movement, would be a political as well as a military disaster.

In ASIA the Russians have now retreated along the whole line, and have frankly confessed that they had underrated their opponents' strength, and had committed an imprudence by trusting to isolated columns without supporting them by reserves. Thus the right wing, under General Oklobjo, has retired into Russian territory, the centre, under General Melikoff, has also retreated, while the left wing under General Tergukassoff is trying to relieve the citadel of Bajazid, whose garrison is closely besieged by the Turks under Faick Pasha. There are reports from Turkish sources of various engagements in which the Russians have been defeated, and notably of the Russian left wing, which Ismail Pasha is said to have pursued over the frontier. The Russians are nevertheless bombarding Kars more vigorously than ever, but they have not been able to prevent the advance of Mouktar Pasha, who with the main body of the Turkish forces arrived on the 7th inst. at Djievlikia, about five miles distant from Kars, and opened communication with the garrison, the new Governor Mehemed Pasha having been previously enabled to enter the city with a reinforcement of 4,000 men.

The British Government having represented to the Porte that the blockade of the Black Sea was wholly inefficient, the commanders have received orders to be more vigilant and active. The work of the fleet this week has been a bombardment of Eupatoria and an attack by two vessels on the Russian position at Otshamtshir, on the river Kalinga, where a combined land and sea assault took the Russians by surprise, and inflicted great loss upon them. The Turks, adopting the Russian tactics, are now accusing the enemy of having committed great cruelties upon the Moslems in Armenia, and in circulars to the Powers cite all species of atrocities, ranging from pillage and wanton destruction of hospitals to useless murders and flogging naked women with the knout. It is admitted that in Europe during the entrance by the Russians into Sistova the Christian inhabitants committed serious excesses upon the Turks out of revenge for their former tyranny; but the probability is that the asserted "atrocities" are the inevitable result of warfare in a semi-barbarous country carried on by semi-barbarous troops such as both sides employ for irregular cavalry. Thus it is said that at Simnitza the Czar and Colonel Wellesley found a Bulgarian wounded by the Bashi-Bazouks, who had cut open his head in the form of a cross. Anent our military attaché, he has been warmly received by the Czar, to whose head-quarters he is now permanently attached.

ROUMANIA has at last received a half-hearted assent from the Czar to her active participation in the war, and it is said that a bridge is now being prepared at Gruja, by which the little army will cross the Danube. It was at first thought that a Roumanian-Servian alliance had been concluded, by which the Roumanians might enter Turkey by way of Servian territory, but, Austria having put a very decided veto upon any such arrangement, the Roumanians will have to force a passage for themselves. In this they will receive little or no assistance from the Russians, who by no means favour the movement.

SERVIA has been holding her Skuptchina at Kragujevatz. The Assembly has dutifully echoed the Prince's speech, and has professed unlimited loyalty, gratitude, and confidence. A minority, however, has openly avowed its dissatisfaction, and has resigned, new elections being at once ordered. In the mean time the Cabinet is once again reported to be on bad terms with the Porte, owing to having remonstrated against the concentration of a strong Turkish force at Nisch, and having received a very decided refusal to her demand that it should be removed. These troops are being concentrated from MONTENEGRO, which for some reason is being evacuated by the Turkish forces which, it is supposed, are wanted for more important work farther East.

At CONSTANTINOPLE there is considerable uneasiness, owing to the news of the Russian advance, but there has been some rejoicing over the supposed disgrace of Redif and Mahmoud Damad Pashas, and it is thought that the reign of the Palace Cabal is fast coming to an end. The news of the despatch of the British fleet to Besika Bay has not given general satisfaction, the general notion being that perfidious Albion, noting the Russian advance, is anxious to secure her share of the spoil.

FRANCE.——The electoral campaign is being actively conducted by both parties, and the Cabinet, by exercising every possible weapon of authority—even to forbidding other than Conservative newspapers to enter military hospitals—are striving to prevent the Republicans from canvassing the electors. Public discussion is prohibited, railway officials are warned to propagate Radical prints, a map of France showing in red the various departments which last election had voted for the 363 has been confiscated, while Conservative pamphlets, poems, and treatises on Marshal MacMahon are being actively circulated, and Prefects have been instructed to send in a return of all political items relating to their particular district. Of course the Liberals are crying out as loudly as they dare against these repressive measures and the whole system of official candidatures, but without the slightest avail, so that they are making the most of the small means that remain to them to keep up the spirits of their electoral supporters. M. Lemoinne of the Débats has wholly gone over to M. Gambetta, whom of old he so bountifully abused as a demagogue and a tyrant, while the Temps has announced "propagandist subscriptions" at greatly reduced prices, and declares its intention to send a thousand gratis subscriptions to influential electors in the small towns and villages of France. M. Thiers has not issued his looked-for circular; but M. Gambetta has made another speech, the occasion being the presentation to him of a handsome gold watch by some Alsace-Lorrainers who have settled in Bienne, Switzerland. In his discourse he again declared his conviction that the Liberals would conquer peacefully through the ballot-box, and that in a few weeks France will have spoken, "and then who will feel himself strong enough to resist France?" He once more eulogised M. Thiers, whose health he declared was never more sound and excellent, despite the assertion of the other side, and concluded by repeating his assertion that he had no intention of figuring himself as a leader in the campaign, but "disinterestedly and without arrière pensée" would fight in the "ranks of the Democracy."

In the mean time the date of the elections has not been fixed, and there are signs of division in the Conservative ranks, the Cabinet and the Monarchists wholly disapproving of the attitude of the Bonapartists and their cool assumption that all that has been done is for the restoration of Napoleon IV. There has been a sharp article on the subject in the Moniteur, in which it is announced that the Marshal will not tolerate the promotion of the personal interests of the Bonapartists under cover of the Conservative Union, and this article has been followed by a general wrangling, in which both sides are displaying great bitterness. The Republicans are naturally greatly rejoicing at this turn of events. The Conservatives, on their side, are making capital out of the peccadilloes of young M. Ordinaire, one of the 363, who has been gambling at Saxon les Bains, and omitting to pay a waiter of whom he had borrowed 80*l*., and has also been mixed up with an absconding bankrupt of Lyons whom he had joined in certain speculations. M. Gambetta has accordingly ostracised him from the party.

From Paris there is very little news. The weather has been wet and windy, and the only "gossip" has been about the new electric light, which has been tried at the Palais de l'Industrie and the Lyons Railway Station with eminently satisfactory results.—The Duc de Broglie has received a deputation from the Chamber of Commerce of Northern France, which, representing the linen, cotton, coal, and metal interests, begged the Government to prolong the existing treaties of commerce for several years. The Minister replied that certain propositions had been made to England to which a reply had not yet been given, so that for the present no final resolution could be adopted. Permission has now been given to officers and soldiers to wear spectacles—a concession which, for some reason or other, despite many remonstrances, has long been refused.

GERMANY.——The much-talked-of order prohibiting the exportation of horses has been issued, together with a notice pointing out that this measure is disconnected with politics, and that Austria and Russia have already taken this step. Horses intended solely for "luxury" may be exported with a special permit.—Emperor William has gone to Coblenz, and Prince Bismarck has paid another visit to Berlin.—General Grant arrived at Cologne on Monday, and left next day for Coblenz.

INDIA.——The famine reports from Bombay indicate that the worst is over. Supplies are stated to be abundant, the general state of the people is better, there is a decrease of 70,000 on the Relief Works, and it is hoped that all cause of anxiety will soon cease. In Madras, however, the prospects are less cheerful, although they also are improving. The numbers on the works exceeds a million and a quarter, and the continued rise of prices causes considerable anxiety.—The amount tendered for the Four per Cent. Loan of 25,000,000 rupees amounted to 33,250,000 rupees. The Papal Jubilee was celebrated on the 10th ult. with great pomp at the Roman Catholic Cathedral, Calcutta.—Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy is dead.

UNITED STATES.——The Mexican difficulty continues to be the chief topic. Senator Blaine, when speaking on the "Fourth," warned the country against any aggression upon Mexico under the guise of "protection of the frontier," and inveighed against any proposition to annex Mexico. If any annexation were advisable the incorporation of the British American provinces would be the most beneficial. The President, however, has since distinctly denied that he favours Mexican annexation. Respecting his Southern policy, which also formed a favourite topic with the speakers of the "Fourth," Mr. Hayes said he "wished to effect a complete reconciliation with the South, and would leave it to time "to vindicate his course." The Indian war in Idaho does not seem to prosper, and Colonels Perry and Whipple, lured by an apparent retreat, advanced too far into the territory of the Indians, who, suddenly rallying, cut off the courier column, and surrounded the little force. A courier succeeded in breaking through, and reported the affair to General Howard, who hurried forward to their succour. Indian runners are rousing the tribes, and the settlers are taking refuge in the military forts.

MISCELLANEOUS.——BELGIUM has been entertaining ex-President Grant and his family, and at Brussels there was a Court dinner in their honour.—In SPAIN Señor Castellar, having complained in the Cortes of the expulsion of Zorilla from France, the Minister for Foreign Affairs replied that Zorilla had been conspiring against the Monarchy.—From SWITZERLAND an enormous harvest of hay is reported.—From the TRANSVAAL we learn that all the native chiefs have given in their adhesion, that the country is quiet and highly satisfied, and that the taxes are coming in rapidly. At Cape Colony the Bill for the annexation of Griqualand West has unanimously passed the second reading in the Assembly.

THE COURT

THE Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold, were to leave Windsor for Osborne yesterday (Friday) on Her Majesty's usual autumn visit to the Isle of Wight. The Queen at the end of last week received the Swedish and Norwegian Minister, Sir E. Thornton, the British Ambassador to the United States, and the Minister at Bogota, and entertained the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, and Viscount and Viscountess Tarbat at dinner. On Saturday Her Majesty drove to Old Windsor to see Mrs. Bagster, the widow of the publisher of the Polyglot Bible, who will attain her hundredth year next month, and Prince Leopold returned to Windsor from visiting the Princess Louise. Next morning the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended service in the private chapel, and in the evening Prince and Princess Christian, the Duchess of Roxburgh, the Dowager Marchioness of Ely, Lord Beaconsfield, Lord de Ros, and Mr. Montagu Corry dined with Her Majesty, the Queen also giving an audience to Lord Beaconsfield. On Monday Her Majesty gave audience to the Judge Advocate-General, and in the afternoon the Queen and the Princess Beatrice drove on to Ascot Heath, to inspect the preparations for the review, Princess Louise and Prince Leopold joining Her Majesty on the Heath. The Queen gave a dinner-party in the evening, at which the Princess Louise, the Duke of Cambridge, the Marquis of Lorne, Sir E. and Lady Thornton, the Duchess of Roxburgh, and the Dowager Marchioness of Ely were the principal guests. Next day Princess Louise and her husband, Prince Leopold, and Sir Edward and Lady Thornton left the Castle, and in the afternoon Her Majesty, with the Princesses Christian and Beatrice and the Duke of Cambridge, held a review in Windsor Great Park. The Queen was received with a Royal salute, and drove down the line, returning to the saluting point for the march past. On Wednesday Her Majesty held a Council at Windsor Council, and on Thursday the Queen and the Princess Beatrice were to come up to town to be present at the Prince and Princess of Wales's garden party.

The Prince and Princess of Wales with their children and Prince Waldemar of Denmark, who has been visiting his sister, returned to town at the end of last week. The Princess on her way back for the first time visited Newmarket to see the Prince's Arabian horse Alep run in a match. Alep however was beaten. On Saturday the Prince and Princess with Prince Waldemar went to Burlington House, where the Princess distributed the prizes to the children attending the schools of the Chapel Royal Savoy. Some of these prizes were sent by the Queen, and consisted of collarettes and fichus worked by Her Majesty and Princess Beatrice. The Prince and Princess afterwards visited the Hunterian Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, where the skeleton of the first tiger killed by the Prince had been placed, and in the evening they with Prince William of Hesse went to hear Lohengrin at Covent Garden. On Monday the Prince and Princess, with the Princess Louise, Prince Waldemar, and Prince William of Hesse, inspected Sir Richard Wallace's art collection in Manchester Square, and in the afternoon Prince Waldemar left London to rejoin his vessel at Southampton, the Prince and Princess going to the station to see him off. In the evening they dined with Earl and Countess Cadogan. Next day the Prince of Wales and Prince George went to the Duke of Devonshire's garden party at Chiswick, and in the evening the Prince and Princess dined with the Earl of Northbrook and Lady Emma Baring. On Wednesday evening there was a State Ball at Buckingham Palace, at which the Prince and Princess and the other members of the Royal Family were present. Next day the Prince and Princess were to have a garden party at Marlborough House. To-day (Saturday) the Prince and Princess will visit Wantage to unveil the statue of Alfred the Great. They will go in state to the market-place, where an address will be presented and the statue inaugurated, and after the ceremony the Prince and Princess will go to Lockinge Park to stay with Colonel and Mrs. Loyd Lindsay until Monday, a garden party being given in their honour. Next Saturday, the Prince and Princess will be present at Lady Holland's garden party at Holland House.

Princess Christian presented the rewards given by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals to the children of the London schools at St. James's Hall on Wednesday. On Thursday the Princess was to give away the prizes of the Prince Consort's Windsor Association at the annual meeting in the Home Park. The Princess will lay the corner-stone of the new workshops at the Home for Little Boys on the 28th inst., and the Prince will preside at the luncheon.—The Princess Louise gave away the prizes to the successful competitors in the Children's Flower Show at Argyll Lodge, Campden Hill, on Wednesday.—The Duke of Edinburgh has been visiting Constantinople, and was to rejoin the British Squadron in Besika Bay on Thursday.—The Duke of Connaught visited the Queen's County Rose Show at Maryborough on Saturday, and inspected the camp of the Queen's County Rifles, going afterwards to stay until Sunday night with Captain Crosby at Stradbally Hall.—Prince Leopold on Saturday inaugurated a memorial tablet to Alberigo Gentili, the founder of international law, in St. Helen's Church, Bishopsgate, Gentili having been buried in the churchyard. The Prince on Wednesday laid the first stone of the new infirmary of the Earlswood Asylum, Redhill.

The Emperor and Empress of Brazil made a short tour in the Lake District at the end of their Scottish tour, and crossed from Barrow-in-Furness to Belfast, where they went to the Giant's Causeway, and thence to Dublin. After doing the lions in Dublin their Majesties went to Killarney and Cork, whence they returned to Dublin and crossed to England, returning to London on Wednesday.—The Comte and Comtesse de Paris are in London.

MUSIC

Royal Italian Opera.——At Covent Garden we have had only repetitions of performances already noticed. Il Barbiere, Lohengrin, Dinorah, I Puritani, Il Trovatore, and Il Vascello Fantasma have all been given "for the last time this season." To night we are promised the new Italian version of Otto Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, produced many years ago at the old house in the Haymarket, under the title of Falstaff. One of the "merry wives" (Mrs. Ford) is to be impersonated by the charming Zaré Thalberg, of whom it will not seem surprising that her husband should be jealous. Next week (last of the season) we are to have a single representation of M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, with Mdlle. Albani as Ophelia, which alone will impart a special interest to the occasion. We reserve general remarks.

Her Majesty's Theatre.——The first performance of Wagner's Lohengrin was in several instances remarkable. The Ortrud of Mdlle. Marie Rôze, though by no means comparable with the Ortrud of Mdlle. Titiens, is, nevertheless, a carefully considered and highly intelligent performance. The Elsa of Madame Christine Nilsson is one of the most thoughtful, finished, and admirable impersonations on the lyric stage. Wagner himself never witnessed such an embodiment of (Brunnhilde not forgotten) his especially cherished heroine. Madame Nilsson has not merely studied the music, but the character (which, it need scarcely be said, she looks to perfection), with conscientious earnestness, and has taken both to heart, the result being something unique of its kind. Elsa is assuredly Wagner's most ethereal creation, and its embodiment by Christine Nilsson is the absolute realisation of the poet's idea. Who would not be a "Knight of the Swan," to champion such a persecuted lady? Who can wonder at Lohengrin's regret in leaving her, even though returning to the guardianship of the Holy Graal? Wagner has just completed Parcival (or, as we should say, Percival). Has he found another Elsa, who shall be to the father what Elsa is to Lohengrin the son? We doubt it—while admitting that Wagner's poetical invention is apparently inexhaustible. If Signor Fancelli could (like Signor Nicolini) wear the semblance of the character as well as he sings and acts it, we might be cheated into believing that the real Lohengrin was before us. The music offers no difficulties whatever to his magnificent voice—one of the finest of existing tenors; and he has thoroughly mastered the requirements essential to a fairly dramatic presentment of the mythic hero. But something more is wanted, and that something more Nature has denied to Signor Fancelli. The other characters are efficiently sustained by Signor Galassi (Telramund), Herr Rokitanski (the King), and Signor Franceschi (the Herald). The opera is carefully put upon the stage, and the general execution under Sir Michael Costa is highly effective. The other performances, as at the Royal Italian Opera, have consisted exclusively of repetitions. Madame Gandini Gerster, the new soprano, has again appeared, both in the Sonnambula and Lucia, without however affording us any reason to modify the opinion of her talent already expressed. She possesses distinguished ability, but has yet much to acquire before she can be accepted without reserve as a finished artist. The Trovatore, with Signor Tamberlik, vice Herr Wachtel, as Manrico, sufficed emphatically to show the difference between a genuine artist and a make-believe. Madame Nilsson being indisposed, the part of Leonora was confided to Madame Marie Rôze, who, not for the first time, displayed eminent capability. The value of this lady as a working member of the company, ready at any emergency to fill the place of a comrade, can hardly be over-estimated. A morning performance of Don Giovanni, with M. Faure as the hero, Signor Tamberlik as Ottavio, Mesdames Trebelli, Marie Rôze, and Nilsson, as Zerlina, Donna Anna, and Donna Elvira, Herr Rokitanski as Leporello, Signor Zoboli and Brocolini as Masetto and the Commandant, brought together a "combination cast" which attracted one of the largest audiences of the season. There was scarcely a vacant place to be seen. Of the performance generally it is needless to speak. The opera advertised for this evening is Lohengrin. On Tuesday Madame Gerster is to give a new opportunity of adjudging her claims to consideration, as Elvira, in the Puritani. On Saturday, the 28th inst., the theatre will close.

Philharmonic Concerts.——On Monday night the last concert of the season (the 65th) was given in St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Cusins. The symphony was Mendelssohn's in A minor ("Scotch"). The chief feature of interest, however, was the "Elegiac Overture," composed by Herr Joachim for his Cambridge degree as Doctor in Music. This pleases more and more every time it is heard. Herr J. Wieniawski, brother to the eminent violinist, played Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in C minor remarkably well; and the charming violinist Mdlle. Pommereuil gave one of the most showy pieces of Vieuxtemps in a brilliant manner. The singers were Miss Catherine Penna and Mr. Santley. The concert ended, as usual on such occasions, with Weber's Jubilee overture.

Waifs.—It is again with sincere regret we have to state that there is no improvement whatever in the state of Mdlle. Titiens's health. The idea of her appearing in public this season is out of the question; nor are there, we fear, any hopes of her ever resuming the profession of which she has long been so bright an ornament. —The last of the Floral Hall Concerts, at which all the principal members of Mr. Gye's operatic company are to take part, is announced for this afternoon.—Mdlle. Caroline Salla, the new-comer who has made so favourable an impression this season at Her Majesty's Theatre (where, it is to be hoped, she may be heard again next year), has returned to Paris.—It is believed that the Emperor of Austria will attend the forthcoming festival to be held at Salzburg, in commemoration of Mozart.—The Harp Recital of Mr. Frederick Chatterton, in Willis's Rooms, was, as usual, a great success with the many admirers of the instrument of which he has long been recognised as one of the most accomplished professors. Miss Mary Chatterton, who gives every promise of becoming an expert worthy the name she bears, not only in a duet with Mr. Chatterton, but in a solo on Welsh melodies, highly distinguished herself; and Miss Ada Clark, a young pupil of Mr. Chatterton's, showed great proficiency in "The Nymph's Revel," a "rhapsody" from the pen of the concert-giver. "The Prince of Wales's Grand March," performed by ten amateurs, also pupils of Mr. Chatterton, was a special feature of the programme, in which the clever Miss Julia Woolf took part, as pianist, Misses Lattue Laverne, Venie Roy, and Helen d'Alton, as vocalists. It is only necessary to add that Mr. Chatterton's own solo was his "Fantasie Brillante," on themes from Robert le Diable—how he plays which it would be superfluous to say.

SPORTING

The Turf.——The last day of the July meeting at Newmarket will probably be a memorable one in the annals of the Turf at head-quarters, for on that day the colours of the Prince of Wales were first seen in "flat" racing. It was the first time indeed during the present century that a Royal racing jacket had been donned on the famous heath. The occasion, from a racing point of view, was an unimportant one, as it was only a match between His Royal Highness's Arab Alep and Lord Strathnairn's Avowal, but it was so far interesting as showing that a second class English thoroughbred is much more than a match for a "pedigree" Arab, the unbeaten victor of numberless races abroad, over a four mile course. The day, too, was marked by the fact that the Princess of Wales for the first time honoured the heath with her presence. That the action of the Prince of Wales will make him still more popular than he already has been with a certain and large section of the community is highly probable, but whether, taking all things into consideration, his personal identification with even our "national sport" was an advisable step is open to grave question.

At the meeting of the Jockey Club at Newmarket steps were taken to mark the appreciation in which the late Admiral Rous was held by the upper section of the Turf world as they have already been by the lower. The sum collected, which doubtless will be a large one, will probably be applied to the foundation of some almshouses at the Turf metropolis—a very appropriate suggestion.

The Liverpool July Meeting, always a popular one, did not open very grandly on Tuesday, small fields being the order of the day, the only really interesting race being that for the Molyneux Cup, in which Trappist gave lumps of weight to Caramel and four others and beat them easily, thus indirectly showing what a wonderful horse among our moderns Springfield must be. For some unaccountable reason the fields were no better on Wednesday, notwithstanding the liberality of the lessees, and the sport was far from interesting. Lord Lonsdale won three races, his four year old Hesper giving Footstep 7lb. and a beating in the Liverpool Plate. Helena scored another victory for the Duke of Westminster in the Bickerstaffe Stakes, and John Day took the Aintree Cup. Winchester clashed with Liverpool, but did not seem to suffer thereby, the racing being quite up to the usual standard of this favourite southern gathering.

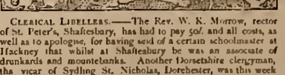
For the St. Leger Chamant holds the pride of place in the quotations at a trifle over 3 to 1, Silvio, the Derby winner, standing at 4 to 1, while a dark animal named Swlog—a son of Sea Saw—is backed at 25 to 1.

Cricket.——Plenty of fine cricket in London and elsewhere is to be chronicled.—The last of the now annual three matches between the Gentlemen and Players was concluded at Prince's on Saturday last in favour of the Gentlemen by nine wickets, the amateur element thus again asserting that predominance over the professional which it has shown almost uninterruptedly for the last ten years. Mr. G. F. Grace's 134 and Ulyett's 118 were the batting features of the match, while Mr. W. W. Read's 72 was an admirable innings.—On the same day at Manchester, Nottingham, having played much below its standard, fell an easy prey to Lancashire—a result mainly due to the admirable bowling of M'Intyre and Watson.—Kent still continues to play well and luckily, and has beaten Sussex at Brighton by no less than 10 wickets. For the home county Mr. F. Penn made 61, and the old Oxford bowler (Mr. Foord-Kelcey) 74, but Lord Harris, who seems a little off this season, could only contribute 12. Charlwood was the only batsman who made two fair innings for Sussex, marking 36 and 47, but Lillywhite in his second put together 52.—As might have been anticipated, Yorkshire has had no great difficulty in beating the aspiring county of Derbyshire; and Notts, in a match at Lord's for the benefit of G. Howitt, has defeated unlucky Middlesex by nine wickets.

Pedestrianism.——The fifty miles walking match for various prizes at Lillie Bridge on Monday last was a fairly successful affair, no less than seventeen men starting. A. Hancock proved himself the best of the party by doing his "little walk" in 8 h. 27 min. 45 sec., and beating his brother, O. Hancock, who was second, by over two miles. It is by no means unlikely that the winner, had he been pressed, would have eclipsed the best time on record—viz., 8 h. 19 min. 55 sec.

Billiards.——The professionals keep the balls rolling, and big breaks are still in the ascendant. In a recent match of 500 between W. Cook and J. Roberts, jun., the former went away at 24, and won with a break of 476, and being asked by the company to continue the break, he made it up to 756, though chiefly by the aid of the spot stroke.

Lawn Tennis, the youngest of our established outdoor pastimes, has had a definite mark made in its history, as during the week the first Championship gathering has been held at the All England Club Ground, Wimbledon.



LEGAL

Clerical Libellers.——The Rev. W. K. Morrow, rector of St. Peter's, Shaftesbury, has had to pay 50*l.* and all costs, as well as to apologise, for having said of a certain schoolmaster at Hackney that whilst at Shaftesbury he was an associate of drunkards and mountebanks. Another Dorsetshire clergyman, the vicar of Sydling St. Nicholas, Dorchester, was this week indicted for writing and publishing false, scandalous, and defamatory libels concerning the Rev. G. W. Whitehead, who was formerly curate of Sydling, and had been a rival candidate for the living. The defendant, however, obtained the appointment, and subsequently accused his rival of having been "turned out" for drunkenness. He also adopted the singular expedient of sowing mustard and cress in the vicarage garden, so that when the plant came up the words "Whitehead is a scamp" were presented to view. At the trial, under counsel's advice, he pleaded guilty, and Lord Chief Justice Coleridge sentenced him to two months imprisonment, remarking that he had never read a more malignant libel.

"White Gloves."——These symbols of purity, which are always presented to the judge or magistrate who may happen to preside when there are no charges of any kind to dispose of, have within the last few days been bestowed in no fewer than four different courts, the recipients being Lord Chief Baron Kelly at Dolgelly, the Recorder of Maidstone at the Quarter Sessions of that borough, and the aldermen on duty at the Guildhall and Mansion House police courts. We know not whether these facts are to be taken as indications of a "gratifying diminution of crime," or whether they only mean that in the districts over which the above-mentioned courts have jurisdiction all the naughty people have been asleep or making holiday.

"Fully Paid-up Shares" are it seems not always quite so valuable as the phrase might lead one to suppose. The knowledge of this fact has been dearly bought by the proprietors of the Whitehaven Gazette and some thirty or forty other provincial newspapers, who were foolish enough to accept paper instead of cash for the insertion of advertisements of "The Church and Empire" Insurance Company. "The Church and Empire" was soon disestablished, and the too-confiding newspaper owners not only get nothing for their advertisements but will have to help to pay the Company's debts. Such is the decision of Vice-Chancellor Hall, founded on a certain section of the Companies' Act of 1867, which provides that all shares shall be paid for in cash unless an agreement to the contrary is registered.

Floating Public Companies.——On Monday Vice-Chancellor Malins made some startling statements before the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the working of the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867. He proclaimed himself still an advocate of the Limited Liability system, although he admitted that it had been very much abused, as in the case of "Overend, Gurney, and Co." No company should be started with less than 1,000*l.* subscribed. He knew of one (he would not mention names) formed by a financier among his clerks wherein only 35*l.* was subscribed, and it was sold in a few days for 400,000*l.* In another case, a fire insurance company, the advertised capital was 250,000*l.*; but all that was subscribed was 1,110*l.*, and when a fire occurred and a demand for money was made, it was proved that the company never had command of more than 300*l.* at one time. In the case of "Twycross v. Grant," the nominal capital was 300,000*l.*; but all that could be found when the company was wound up was 8,000*l.* in plant. He thought it impossible for the Legislature to protect the public from fraud, the devices and ingenuity of swindlers being so many and so great.

Erratic Jurymen.——At the Middlesex Sessions the other day a stableman was put on his trial for stealing a bridle. The evidence seemed more than usually clear; but the jury astonished everybody in court by returning a verdict of not guilty. Mr. Serjeant Cox, who was on the bench, was so indignant at the result that he peremptorily ordered the jury out of the box, remarking that he could not entrust them with any further business.—Another singular verdict was given last week in Jersey. A carter was charged with opening the gate of a level crossing on the Eastern Railway when a train was approaching, and thus causing danger to other vehicles. He pleaded guilty; but the jury at first said that they did not believe he intended to commit a crime, and on the Court refusing to accept this as a verdict, found the prisoner not guilty.

Miscellaneous Items.——A true bill for wilful murder has been found against the four persons accused of having caused the death of Mrs. Staunton at Penge, and they will be tried at the Central Criminal Court, whither the case has been removed by writ of certiorari.—Martha Baker, a Manchester "domestic," who was charged with giving poison to her mistress with intent to murder her, has been acquitted under the direction of the judge, who held that, as there was not sufficient poison in the "medicine" to make it fatal, the charge could not be sustained. —At Monaghan, in Ireland, a man is about to be tried for the murder of his wife by stopping her mouth with earth.—A curious charge of perjury has just been heard at the Worcestershire Assizes. It seems that in March last two men named Foster and Crumpton were convicted of a violent assault on one George Morgan, and were each sentenced to five years' penal servitude. It was however shown, by subsequent evidence, that there had been a stand-up fight between Foster and Morgan, and that the latter was not so much injured as the former. Morgan has in consequence been found guilty of perjury, and sentenced to penal servitude for five years, and the Home Office will be appealed to for a "free pardon" for the two men who were unjustly convicted.—A rate collector of Bristol, whose defalcations amount to 2,000*l.*, has been committed for trial for embezzlement, forgery, and falsification of the rate-books. It is said that there is only one other case of the kind on record, and that dates from 1780, when Lord Mansfield decided that any one altering a rate-book, even with the approbation of the justices, was guilty of a crime.—The other day a man walked into the Bow Lane Police Station, and gave himself into custody for stealing a Bible from a church into which he said he had broken. He produced a whole budget of burglar's tools, remarking as he did so, "That is what I call being my own policeman." He is now under remand.—A curious will suit has just been decided by Sir R. Phillimore and a special jury. The will propounded was made in 1876 by a gentleman named Hutton, and was disputed by his widow, in whose favour a former will had been made. It was shown that in 1874 the testator had met with a serious accident while hunting, ever since which he had been nervous, irritable, and suspicious, behaving in the most strange manner, and without any cause or reason accusing his wife and her relatives of drunken and dissolute conduct. His insanity being thus proved to the satisfaction of the Court, judgment was given against the will of 1876, and as the original will of 1871 had been lost, a draft copy of it which had been preserved was admitted to probate as expressive of the testator's intentions when of sound mind.

Grasshoppers in Algeria are no longer to be considered as a plague, but as a source of considerable revenue to the colony. Hitherto at the appearance of a flight of these insects the inhabitants have immediately set to work to stupefy and burn them, or bury them while in a state of torpor. Now, however, a French chemist has discovered the means of extracting a brilliant dye from the grasshoppers, while the farmers find out that they make splendid manure, so that the Algerian Government intend to try the experiment of utilising the insects. One Arab tribe roast the grasshoppers, which are said to taste like dried nuts. If the experiment prove successful the hint may be useful to the Americans.

*"THROUGH BRITTANY"

To Brittany by boat for St. Malo or Morlaix, or better still by the long leisurely railway route through Paris to Angers and Nantes—who shall suggest a merrier round for a bright summer month, or marvel if books about Brittany accumulate and tourists feel their hearts burn within them to set down their impressions of hostelries whose homely fare is made more appetising by moderate charges and by kindly welcome; of hills where the wild boar and the wolf abound within an hour or two of English shores; of wild waves and tortured rocks, each with its tale of wrecks and storm; of moorlands dotted with Druidic avenues; of Pardons and pilgrimages, in whose rites the memory of the Korrigan is but half effaced by the legend of the Virgin and St. Anne? A marvel of condensed information, Mrs. Macquoid's "Through Brittany" may challenge comparison with any rival work for the fulness of its description of each and all these features (the second alone except) of Breton travel, while boasting quite a special excellence of its own in its sympathetic sketches of Breton life and manners, and of the subtler shades of difference to be found, not between Breton merely and Norman, but between Bretons pur sang, between the men of the Morbihan and of Cornouaille, or between these again and sad-eyed Leonnais or gentle priest-loving natives of Treguier. A bright sunshiny volume, where pen and pencil play an equal part, and legends of the Brittany of old are neatly interwoven with notes of the Brittany of to-day for the instruction of those who shall come after, it combines for all the coast-line between Nantes and Brest the exactness of the guide-book with the descriptive charm of the finished book of travel. And it is just along this southern line—North Brittany, we gather, will form a second volume—that Breton scenery is most varied and characteristic, that we pass in a few hours from the wooded glens of the Elle or the gigantic onion-beds of Pont-Aven, between which the tall peasant girl seems dwarfed, to the bare rock-ledges of Penmarch and the Raz; from the silent stones of Carnac and Plouharnel to towns and castles that still tell of Du Guesclin and "the Constable."

The sketches whence our engravings have been taken are rather perhaps typical Breton views than views of any special beauty. The Cathedral and Château of Nantes, with the well-preserved wall and towers that have flanked the Loire just four hundred years and the Castle of Clisson (in La Vendée, strictly speaking, but worth insertion here in memory of the knight whose name crops up all over the old Duchy) as you enter Brittany from the south-east; the famed dolmen of Corconno, with its capstone 22 feet in length—a monument once of Kymric chiefs, a barn after the rude wasteful Breton fashion now—and the pretty ruined castle of the De Rohans at Pontivy, as you pass onward through the Morbihan; or westward still half-way to Quimper (whose old houses, leaning forward as if to greet each other from either side the Odet, and twin cathedral spires looking down on the busy streets, will be remembered by all visitors to that most bretonnante of Breton towns), the quaintest bit of all, the old Church of Ste. Barbe, a true medieval eagle's nest in the cliff that sinks from the door sheer down into the Elle, with its little chapel of St. Bernard perched on another spur of rock at the end of the arched terrace just above, around whose base meritorious pilgrims sometimes creep by the aid of rings that are fastened in the wall.

On the whole, however, we prefer the letter-press with its store of Breton legends, from "the Doom of Ker-Is" to the "Battle of the Thirty;" its good descriptions of Breton antiquities, Druidic, Gallo-Roman, and mediæval; its pleasant accounts of inland drives and boating excursions on the Sea of Morbihan. Mrs. Macquoid, too, has done her readers real service by a very excellent index of routes and distances, of inns and prices, not in the chief towns only, but in such out-of-the-way places as Audierne, Pont l'Abbé, &c. Whether, in fact, for instruction where to go or for pleasant readings at odd hours of the day, we could wish the wanderer through South Brittany no better or more trustworthy companion

PIE-STICKING AT POONAH

INDIA of late having had a surfeit of old-young men in the way of Competition Wallahs, it does one's heart (and liver) good to see a genuine lad, and here we have them engaged in the "noble sport" of "pie" sticking. The pariah dog is one of the pests of the country, haunting the villages and camp, making night hideous with its howling, and in the day rushing at every stranger on horse or foot passing its kennel, half starved and savage, often rabid and living in hundreds a mangy existence, fed on offal and the filth of the neighbourhood. To "stick" a dog seems poor sport, but they sometimes give a good "run" across country, and our friends lately from Sandhurst—on direct appointments—seem at all events to be pulling up the art of riding. Soon they'll change their game, and hunt the grey boar over the stony plains of the Deccan. Let us hope that they will enjoy it equally, and that the youngster in the background who has just had a "pip" from his pony will find soft ground to fall upon. His "tattoo," who most likely has had hard times of it since in his present master's possession, appears used to the situation, and takes things easily, but as stones appear to be the principal growth of the land, he won't get much of a snack before his owner had rubbed himself all right, and mounts the pigskin again.—Our engraving is from a sketch by Mr. G. D. Giles, 5th N.L.I., Poona, Bombay.

THE GREAT FIRE AT ST. JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK

This disastrous fire began on the afternoon of Wednesday, June 20th, in a building on the south of York Point Slip. In a few minutes after the first outbreak it had already passed beyond control, and in half an hour's time it was threatening the entire town. Although the firemen got to work right speedily, both sides of Union Street were soon in flames, and the conflagration, proceeding along Smyth Street in a southerly direction, soon reached Nelson Street and the South Wharf. With the strong wind from the north-west, the entire wharf was soon in a blaze. All Wednesday night and during the whole of Thursday the flames swept onwards, and ceased only when there was nothing left for them to feed upon. The greater number of the public buildings, churches, and newspaper offices were destroyed, and the bulk of the inhabitants were left without food and shelter. Never was the beneficent effect of the electric telegraph more obvious. Messages were flashed in all directions, and from various parts both of the Dominion and of the United States, replies speedily arrived promising immediate succour. Subscriptions have also been opened in London under the auspices of the Lord Mayor, as well as at Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow, which will, it is to be hoped, meet with a liberal response. Meanwhile a dark side of human nature is exhibited in the fact not merely that there was much marauding and plundering, but that several scoundrels were detected in the act of causing fresh fires for the sake of obtaining booty. We are indebted for the plan which we publish herewith to Messrs. Manchester, Robertson, and Allison, of 29, King Street, St. John, who write thus concerning the disaster :—

"The burnt district is all that part which is shaded. A shows where the fire originated, being in a boiler-maker's shop. B, C, and D are the only three houses in the burnt district that escaped. E is our place of business, where a determined and successful effort was made to stay the progress of the fire on the north side of King Street. The total loss of property is estimated at about 20,000,000 dollars, and the insurance amounts to about 6,000,000 dollars. The saddest part of all is the loss of life. Our people feel deeply gratified for the very tangible feelings and expressions of sympathy that are showered on us from all quarters, and the suffering of the poor and homeless is fast being alleviated. Rebuilding has already commenced in some quarters, and we think that the energy and pluck of our business men have not been extinguished, but that in a very few years, by the blessing of Providence, our city will rise up from its ashes, and that we will be again a prosperous people."

Magazines

II.

The New Quarterly would be worth buying were it only for Mr. Latouche's "Tourist in Portugal," which we are glad to see resumed in the present number. These sketches are both lively and scholarlike, they are full of interesting information about a little-known country, and their accomplished author possesses the rare gift of enabling the reader to see in his "mind's eye" the scenery described.—Besides the novelettes, which are by two "distinguished hands," namely, the author of "Orion" and Mr. George Meredith, we have by Mr. Jefferies an interesting survey of country society, showing how, under the influence of railways and telegraphs, feudalism is gradually vanishing away; and a critique on Edgar Poe, which is wonderfully fresh considering how much has been written concerning that erratic man of genius. The author points out his almost total want of humour, and remarks that "he is one of the very few men of undoubted genius who never, by any chance, move us either to tears or to laughter."

Setting aside the serial stories, the contents of the Cornhill seem more and more to be addressed to an audience "fit though few." Here, for example, are three papers, all excellent of their kind, and yet decidedly of a sort which is "caviare to the general." The first is an elaborate disquisition on the word "Philistine," as used in Mr. Matthew Arnold's sense; the second is an essay by a thoroughly competent hand on the French ballade, with the construction of which Mr. Austin Dobson has recently familiarised us; the third is a learned account, by Professor Ward, of a visit to Delphi. Mr. Proctor, discussing the planet Mars, is more within the scope of an average reader. It is curious that the "planet of war," which shone so brilliantly in 1854, will blaze out brightly again this autumn, when Russ and Turk are once more at strife.

Shakespearian scholars are well acquainted with Mr. Fleay's ingenious method of analysing the writings of the great dramatist. In the present number of Macmillan Mr. Fleay (whose name, by the way, is singularly appropriate to his work) submits Romeo and Juliet to this vivisectional process, and decides that Shakespeare's play is based on an earlier work by Peele.—Sir G. G. Scott, writing on the "Anti-Restoration" question, says very sensibly that while heartily sympathising in its leading aims with the new movement for the preservation of ancient monuments, he must protest against its being carried to the length of leaving our ancient ruins to fall into ruin, or to retain, in all cases, the effects of mutilation, disfigurement, and decay.—Mr. Fyfe writes an interesting anecdotical paper on "Modern Diplomacy." He is severe on Prince Bismarck, holding that there is a great deal of cunning underneath his apparently outspoken frankness.

The same subject, restricted to English diplomacy, is admirably discussed in Blackwood. Our diplomatists, it is shown, as compared with their Continental comrades, fight with their right hands tied behind their backs, because they never can feel sure that England will resort to force, without which in the background the cleverest diplomacy is mere child's play. This is a capital number of Blackwood. We have rarely read a more humorous sketch of a Continental table d'hôte at a tourist resort than that given in the opening of a new story, "Mine is Thine." "Heine," "Lord Abinger," and "The Storm in the East," are all papers worthy of Blackwood's high reputation.

By far the most interesting article in Fraser, to our fancy, is the "Exposition of Betting and Bookmaking." It should be carefully read and digested by that numerous portion of the community who hope to make money by backing racehorses, and will do them far more good than scores of those moral philippics against betting written by well-meaning philanthropists, who understand little or nothing of the business as it is actually conducted. The writer shows clearly that, putting roguery aside, the bookmakers, or layers of the odds, must, as a body, win, and the bettors, or takers of the odds, must, as a body, lose. Legislation has hitherto been futile. It has simply driven a number of speculators to Boulogne, who might just as well have been allowed to stay at home.—Madame Mario (née Jessie White) continues her "Experiences of Ambulances," and gives an interesting account of the extraction of the long-sought Aspromonte bullet from Garibaldi's ancle.—"British Trade" treats this month of Mexico and Brazil, of which countries the essayist says little that is financially favourable.

In the Gentleman's Mr. Proctor gives a clear description of some modern "Marvels in Telegraphy," including the transmission of drawings and of sounds. With regard to the latter he says that "before long Professor Bell's grand invention will be perfected to such a degree that words uttered so low on the Atlantic side that the nearest bystander cannot hear them will be heard distinctly after traversing 2,000 miles under the Atlantic at the European end of the submarine cable." Our descendants in the next century will probably go to listen to the Patti of the period, whether they are in London, New York, Calcutta, or Melbourne, and the fair songstress may save the trouble of facing an audience by staying quietly in her own drawing-room, say on the shores of Lake Como.—Another capital article tells us all about asparagus, including the etymology of that much-abused word.—A poem, entitled "A Dream of Sappho," by Minnie Mackay, shows that the writer has inherited no small portion of her father's talent.

Belgravia, as usual, rests its attractions chiefly on its fiction, which is at present supplied by Mr. James Payn and Mrs. Lynn Linton. Mr. T. Adolphus Trollope writes interestingly on Boccaccio in his series of papers on the Italian poets, and Miss Kate Field furnishes an attractive biography of that famous Trojan, Dr. Schliemann.

In the Dublin University Mr. Ingram, the editor of Edgar Poe's works, writes an attractive account of the Spanish novelist, who wrote such life-like pictures of Andalusian peasant life under the pseudonym of "Fernan Caballero." This lady, who died early this year, aged eighty, was of mixed parentage, half German and half Irish. She was born in Switzerland, yet was thoroughly Spanish by association.—Mr. Bagwell, in his "Basis of Irish Nationalism" gives a rapid yet masterly survey of the history of the Green Isle. He evidently disbelieves in the reality of the Home Rule cry, but considers that it is used by the Ultramontane party as a convenient weapon against the Fenians.

London Society, after its wont, deals chiefly in smartly-written novelettes, and verse of the "society" order, written to match pictures of young ladies more or less fascinating. "Gaol-Birds at Home" is painfully interesting, and the description of the agony endured by the well-bred criminal when he lies on his coarse bed on his first night in prison, cropped and close-shaven, and with his prison-clothes hanging up for him to wear on the morrow, is worthy of Dickens. But what does the writer mean when, speaking of a juvenile offender, he says "his hair was as disgusting to look on as that of an Australian bushman?" Australian bushmen are sometimes roughish fellows, but their heads are rarely deserving of such language as this. He must mean a South African Bosjesman.

A new story in the Atlantic Monthly by Mr. T. B. Aldrich, entitled "The Queen of Sheba," promises to contain some vivid descriptions of rural scenery in New England. There is a good deal of quiet humour in the opening scene of the young bank-clerk who starts for a tour in New Hampshire, and who is so bothered by the eccentric propensity for backing which his mare Mary displays.—Pleasant also are Mr. Stillman's recollections of wandering in the forests of Maine. He gives a very striking description of the paralysing sense of horror which a man feels who thinks he has hopelessly lost his way in the woods. Personal experience enables us to corroborate his statements in every particular.—A writer in "The Contributors' Club" points out that the most sensational incident in "Daniel Deronda," the drowning of Grandcourt, corresponds almost exactly with a scene in Paul Heyse's "Die Einsamen."

THAMES REGATTAS

Old Father Thames, at whom so many reproaches are thrown, whose sins and offences have been recorded in a hundred blue books, and denounced in a hundred parliaments, has a right to some share of credit as well as a great deal of abuse. Although he occasionally gobbles up the farmers' hay-crops, and washes away some of their flocks, he still more often fertilises with Nile-like libations their most productive fields. Although he has a way of flooding the wharves and choking the sewers of South London, he does a deal of hard work in carrying the wharfingers' heavy luggage for them, and carrying off the drainage of the trans-riverain people. Finally, against the rather formidable list of poor wretches annually drowned beneath his muddy eddies must be set in the opposite scale the enormous numbers who throughout the summer take their pastime on his broad surface. It is astonishing how greatly this last-mentioned class has increased within the past few years. The boat-builders and the lock-keepers could give, if they chose, some curious statistics as to the increasing popularity of the much-abused and much-slighted river. Where once only a stray punt-fisher was to be seen watching his float, or a lazy crew of undergraduates whiling away a week of the vacation, there may now be seen throughout June, July, and August the neat and luxurious craft of the Londoner, equipped with bag and baggage, tent, and cooking apparatus, and all the paraphernalia of a picnicking campaign. All along the banks of the Lower Thames, from Chiswick up to Staines, the dainty villas which have sprung into being send forth their inmates, clad in all the glory of many-coloured flannels and bewitching muslins, to flit up and down the stream; and on a fine evening few of the hundred miles of river between London and Oxford are without their half-score of pleasure boats paddling idly or busily hither and thither.

But it is the boating men in the stricter acceptation of the term—that is, the men who row in races—who have increased most notably, and with them the grand field days on which their competitions are held. Within the last ten years almost every one of the "reaches," or straight pieces of river suitable for racing, have been appropriated to some sort of regatta. Almost every town with any pretensions upon the Thames has given one of these fêtes, which has been more or less successful, and has been repeated more or less often according to the generosity of the local subscribers and the energy of the hon. secretary. It would take too long to enumerate the places which have thus distinguished themselves. Some of them, such as Pangbourne and Wallingford, have achieved a momentary success, and attracted in their day some excellent crews, but under various blighting influences which it would be easy to explain have died away, and been suppressed. Others, such as Walton, attempt annually, but with varying success, to organise a grand regatta. One year the neighbouring magnates, aided by some of the rich parvenues who abound in all places near London, are inspired with a noble generosity, and come down handsomely with their donations. Then a long array of bright silver cups is ordered from Bond Street, and immense handbills are printed and stuck up in the stations and boathouses round about. Another year—and this, we fear, is one of the bad years—a stingy fit seizes upon the Waltonians, and the most strenuous efforts of a patriotic regatta committee cannot induce them to provide funds enough for the purchase of suitable prizes. On the other hand, several new regattas, big and little, seem to have firmly established themselves as permanent institutions, and aspire in some cases almost to rival Henley in the magnificence of their prizes, if not in the quality of the competitors engaged. It is not more than a dozen years since the most ambitious of all these—the Metropolitan Amateur Regatta—was got up by the exertions of the London Rowing Club. Another still more modern aquatic fête is that which is held on the pretty reach between Moulsey Hurst, where the great fights used to be fought, and the picturesque village of Hampton. Finally, to quote a still more recent example, there is the great so-called "International" Regatta, which was rather suddenly started in the autumn of last year, with funds supplied, as it was always understood, by some of the railway companies.

An amateur regatta is not yet a public holiday and jubilee in the same sense as a race meeting on the turf. But there is little reason, especially considering the popularity already achieved by the University boat race, why it should not in time become so. It is not far behind in this respect in some parts of England: Tewkesbury, Evesham, and Hereford, for instance, and some of the northern towns where the "rowing men" are held in the highest honour. But if the enjoyment to be reaped at Ascot or Epsom be compared with that which is attainable at Henley and Walton, and fairly weighed in the balance, there are few, except out-and-out betting men and real lovers of horse-flesh, who will not give a preference to the latter. The cool shade of the trees, the refreshing sight of the water itself are more attractive, to the Londoner at all events, than the dust and glare of a racecourse. There is not, it is true, the same dash and spirit and excitement about a match between eight-oars or scullers that there is in the lightning-like finish of a race between thoroughbreds. But a good downright hard-fought struggle between a pair of well-trained crews is a grand sight in itself; and it may be watched with a critical eye at greater leisure and with a better appreciation of its merits by the spectator who knows nothing either of horses or boats. Moreover it has this grand and paramount advantage that it is rowed fair from start to finish. No one ever heard of an amateur crew which lost a race at a regatta on purpose, whereas who can assert with confidence of any jockey that he never "pulled" his horse? Everything tends to show that these amateur contests, waged on such an attractive scene of battle, will gain in favour with the upper classes, whatever may be the fate of the Turf, now that its old patrons are being so cruelly thinned.

A striking contrast to the Thames regattas in which gentlemen compete is afforded by those in which watermen row. The latter have dwindled and are dwindling away in a deplorable fashion. The professionals have themselves in a great measure to thank for this result. Fouling, jockeying, and unfair positions have been only too prevalent among them, and the gentlemen who would fain support them if they would row fairly and manfully hesitate to lend their sanction or contribute funds where such malpractices are likely to be the rule. A few regattas still remain, patronised by influential and patriotic amateurs. But the public has lost confidence in them, and it will be long, perhaps, before the professional rowing man will again take his place of honour in the boatracing of the Thames.

THE READER

"Critical Miscellanies," by John Morley (Second Series: Chapman and Hall).—Revised reprints—with, we think, one exception—from the Fortnightly, these papers fall into two main divisions; memorials and criticisms of John Stuart Mill by one who was at once a disciple and a friend, studies of eighteenth century France by a writer who has made the period from the Encyclopædists to the Terror his acknowledged specialty. The only two other papers flow naturally in side-currents of thought that branch from these main channels; the first an essay on Macaulay as the writer who side by side with, but in strongest contrast to, J. S. Mill, has been the model of form and method to one half of our modern prose-writers; the second, an address on popular culture with especial reference to the best methods of bringing historical and logical studies to bear their part in the practical education of the many. To say that all these papers are worth reprinting would be but a faint form of praise. To ourselves, at least, there is a charm in Mr. Morley's writings not always found in papers of quite equal cleverness; a charm that strikes us as in part natural, in part acquired, the combined result of a clearness of thought and expression, suggestive of long study of good French novels, and of an earnestness of purpose and evident feeling of the difficulties alluded to or discussed which seem to establish between reader and writer something of a personal contact. Of both these qualities there are ample traces in the volume now before us—in the memorial of J. S. Mill, above all in the close criticism (however much we may differ from it on many points, e.g., on the low position assigned to religious motives as a moral force) of the philosopher's latest and least consistent utterances on the utility of religion and on theism, as in the historical "studies" of the "god-like Turgot," and Robespierre "the incorruptible." Of these two last—the most attractive papers for the general reader in the volume—we must confess to a preference for the Robespierre, though we could have wished that in the account of the final struggle of the Jacobins and the Convention a little more prominence had been given to the disciple born a year too young, the immature but colossal figure of St. Just. The Turgot seems somewhat over-weighted with analyses of the early writings and college theses—little more—of the great financier which tire us before we come to the really fine details of his work as Intendant of the Limousin, and later on as Finance Minister for France. But the papers one and all will bear reading not once but twice—papers full of suggestive thought on subjects of undying interest.

"A Peep Behind the Scenes at Rome" (Chatto and Windus), by T. A. Trollope—a reprint, too, in part from the columns of the Standard—is a fair specimen of the half-dramatised sketches—typical facts and fictitious personages—by which our newspaper correspondents, in their lighter moods, attempt occasionally to put the English reader au courant with the back-stair intrigues and social influences which play so large, if unconfessed, a part in the every-day game of politics abroad. The Mercante de Campagna—Liberal au fond, but with a Clerical wife and daughters eager for admission to the receptions of the Papalini aristocracy; Padre Donovani, priest of all work, lowest but not least influential link in a chain which joins on through Padre Corboli, the fashionable confessor and Monsignore Bartolommeo to the highest circles of the Vatican; Signora Vandini, the thoughtless girl whose large portion must be secured for the Church; Dario Morsa, prosperous editor of the Red Morte à Tutti, ready to combine with the blackest of the Neri if only he and they can oust the Moderates and friends of the Government from their seats in the municipality, are characters which we imagine most old residents at Rome will have no difficulty in recognising. Not without interest, too, are the side pictures of the Roman aristocracy now and forty years ago in the good old days of quiet soirées and unpretentious receptions at the Vatican, when strangers were not expected to kneel, and audacious people like Sir J. Bowring gave Pope Gregory's extended hand a friendly shake, not without some half-suspicion that perhaps he rather meant that they should kiss it. Altogether a pungent and amusing book, though one cannot help thinking that the politics of Rome are, after all, the politique du clocher, and that the first blast of a real crisis would scatter all these cobwebs to the wind.

Under the title of "By Stream and Sea" (Chatto and Windus)—another reprint, though he does not say so—the angler's old friend, "Red Spinner," gives us, side by side with the log of his outward voyage to his new home at Brisbane, some parting sketches of pleasant wanderings by lonely English streams, or bits of scenery caught farther afield in business outings, we may guess, as special correspondent at meetings of the British Association, or wedding festivities by the Neva side. Among them all—though there is certainly something novel in a voyage to the Antipodes with the angling spirit prominent all through, and even taking practical expression in idling hours by the Suez Canal—the rambles by our native streams are the pleasantest and best; by Colne and Chess, with rustics hanging over the bridge, and watching evening effects of light and shade with huge if unanalysed content; by Itchen, with its monster trout; by Wandle and Darenth, with its yearly fishers' carnival; or by the lonely rivers of the Peak. But all are bright and animated throughout, brimful of angling lore and of the angler's love of all things animate or inanimate, save fish and worm—chapters to form a good addition to the small library of the river-side inn, or to be read in city homes with equal pleasure in memory of past delights or gleeful anticipations of holidays to come.

In "Sea and Salmon Fisheries" (Stanford), a new volume of the British Industries Series, the palm for general interest must be given to Mr. E. W. H. Holdsworth's excellent account of the coast fisheries of the United Kingdom; the method of capture, from appliances of universal employ—the trawl, the drift-net, the hand-line—to those of local and restricted use—the Cornish sean, the sprat-fisher's stow-net, the kettle-net of Kent and Sussex; the build of boats, the modes of curing fish; the fishermen themselves, from the hardy temperate trawlers of the North Sea to the improvident and somewhat indolent boatmen of the Sister Isle. Yet no less useful (to those who read such volumes for instruction) is Mr. Archibald Young's comparative survey of salmon rivers in the three kingdoms, with its copious tables of streams improved by salmon passes or injured by pollutions, of open seasons for net and rod, of men employed, annual amount of catch, &c. Apropos, by the way, of the not unfrequent outcry against trawling, we may note that the very limited fishing ground of the Brixham men—the first introducers of the beam-trawl—though worked by them for more than a hundred years, produces now more fish than ever.

"The History of Coaches," by G. A. Thrupp (Kerby and Endean)—a re-issue of lectures delivered last winter before the Society of Arts—must not be taken for one volume more of the now fashionable literature of the road. On the contrary, though small in size, it is a work of infinitely wider scope—a survey at once historical and artistic, of carriages and carriage-building from the dawn of history till now, from the cars and waggons of Greek, Roman, and Briton, through the chariotless barbarianism of the Dark Ages to the revival of vehicles in the Whirlicote and Carroche, and so onwards from the cumbrous but highly decorated State coaches of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, to the elliptical springs, the graceful forms, the facile lightness of our own times. Although a little too technical for careless moods—a volume indeed addressed in the first instance to the coach-builder, and full of closely-reasoned disquisitions on length of shafts, distribution of weight, distance of horses from their work, and so on—it is rich, too, in rare antiquarian details set off by curious illustrations, for which but for its aid we might have to go to books not always accessible to the million. A book in a word of equal interest to the lover of old fashions or the practical student of modern industries.

Of "Scenes of Travel in Norway," by J. C. Phythian (published for the Author by Cassell, Petter, and Galpin) it is not easy to say much in praise or blame. The tour described—from Christiana to the Sogne Fjord and back—is one that men make every year, its incidents the everyday events of Norway travel. Still it is written about not unpleasantly, and may amuse, perhaps, some not too exacting tourist.

"Three Sketches of Life in Iceland," by Carl Andersen, translated by Myfanwy Fenton (R. Washbourne) would interest us more were we quite certain that they are realistic, not idealised, sketches of Icelandic homes. In the one case they are simply pretty tales; in the other curious illustrations of the survival to our own time of thought and manners familiar to every reader of the Sagas—tamer and modernised, no doubt, but genuine survivals still of dark superstitions, of curious aptitudes for mocking improvisations of stern and somewhat savage independence.

Pleasant reminiscences of the Burlington House Exhibition are awakened by "The Royal Academy Album for 1877" (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), edited by S. Jennings. This annual collection of permanent photographs of the more prominent Academy pictures contains some of the best examples of Messrs. Goodall, Alma-Tadema, Marks, Storey, Pettie, Horsley, and a host of other well-known painters, and the work, which is tastefully and carefully executed, not only forms a valuable souvenir of the chief art-exhibition of the year, but is in itself a real édition de luxe for the drawing-room. The photographs, thirty-eight in number, appear to be especially fitted for reproducing land and sea-scapes, while figure subjects are also well represented. For example, Messrs. Cooke and E. Hayes' "Dutch Pinks" are admirably clear and distinct, and Mr. Leader's Alpine scenes and Mr. H. Moore's "Mist and Sunshine" are but little inferior, whilst, amongst others, Mr. Horsley's "The World Forgetting," Mr. Burgess's "Licensing Beggars," Mr. Storey's "Pump Room," and Mr. Sant's portrait of "Mrs. Starkie," are particularly noticeable for the delicacy and truth with which they are here depicted. Altogether, both editor and publishers may well be congratulated on having produced one of the handsomest books of the season.

The Caxton Celebration has evidently suggested "The Earl Printer: a Tale of the Time of Caxton," by C. M. N. (J. F. Shaw). By a judicious mixture of truth and fiction the author presents an attractive picture of life in Caxton's office at Westminster, introducing sober Master Caxton and Wynkyn de Worde, his assistant and successor—as yet a stripling—and detailing the visit of Edward IV. and his Queen. This Royal visit is fraught with serious consequences to the hero, a young Lancastrian noble, disguised as a printer. Pleasantly written, with considerable attention to historic detail, the book is likely to arouse interest about the first English printer and his days in youthful minds which take sparse interest in biographies and exhibitions of black-letter editions.—Sentimentalism versus activity is set forth, much to the detriment of the former, by Mr. Edward Garrett, in "Doing and Dreaming" (Nimmo), a practical story of women's work which may be commended to young ladies who consider it infra dig. to earn their own bread.—In "A Peep Behind the Scenes," by Mrs. Walton (Religious Tract Society), we have a pathetic account of life in a strolling caravan. The gilt is truly off the gingerbread in this recital, as the misery and poverty of the poor players stand out in strong relief to their apparently jovial life.—From the same publishers come "Bible Pictures for our Pets," consisting of Scriptural engravings and descriptions. These illustrations are far superior to the garish coloured prints usually considered suitable to educate the infantile eye.

The delightfully aggravating heroes of "Helen's Babies," Toddie and Budge, reappear in "Other People's Children" (Routledge), and though, perhaps, the sequel lacks the novelty and spontaneity of its predecessor, in genuine unforced fun it is but little behind. Desirous to prove that children should never be checked in questioning, and that a repressive system is the worst style of education, the author most humorously details the utter failure of the "babies'" well meaning, but misguided, aunt to govern such pickles according to set rule and stereotyped theories, and her conversion to the belief that parental government is the best of all. We suspect that however amusing the doings of Toddie and Budge may be to read about, most families will devoutly wish such exploits strictly confined to "other people's children."—American stories come thick and fast. "Dot and Dime" (Routledge) follows the fortunes of two little niggers who indulge in a perpetual fire of stupid repartee in very unintelligible English; and "Out of the Question," by W. D. Howells (Trübner) is a rather dull comedy dealing with life in a Transatlantic country boarding-house, and the triumph of worth over social prejudices.

Norway yearly grows more and more frequented by travellers weary of the regular tourist round of the Continent, and "A Summer Holiday in Scandinavia," by E. Lester Linden Arnold (Sampson Low), pleasantly describes the experiences of a party of four bent upon roughing it in uncomfortable wooden carrioles and far from the civilised luxuries of railways and table d'hôtes. Starting from Christiania the travellers journeyed through South Norway by Lake Miosen up to the Fille Fjeld and the Sogne Fjord, and back to Christiania. They experienced no specially remarkable adventures, however, but met with lovely scenery, unfailing kindness, and a plethora of salmon. Mr. Arnold's volume is unpretending, and calculated to interest the general reader, as it contains some lively descriptions, and is not overladen with grumblings anent food, sport, and accommodation. Nearer home, but scarcely more visited, is "Lundy Island," of which a comprehensive account is given by Mr. J. R. Chanter (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin). Owing to the difficulty of communication, Lundy for many years suffered from great isolation, a fortnightly post having only recently been established.

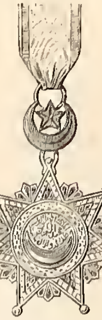
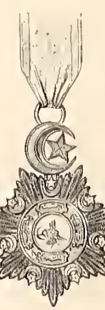
THE ORDERS OF THE OSMANIEH AND MEDJIDIEH

TURKEY possesses three Imperial Orders of decoration—the Nischan-Iftikar, or Military Order of Glory, founded by Sultan Mahmoud II. in 1831; the Medjidie for both soldiers and civilians, instituted by Sultan Abd-ul-Medjid in 1852; and the Civil and Military Order of the Osmanieh, founded by the late Sultan Abd-ul-Aziz in 1861. These decorations of the Imperial Orders are given for various services to the State, one of these services being great care and attention to duty by medical officers. Thus, during the late Servian campaign several British doctors serving with the ambulances were decorated with the two latter Orders. Of these the Order of the Osmanieh is ordinarily reckoned the most important.



THE IMPERIAL ORDER OF THE OSMANIEH



THE IMPERIAL ORDER OF THE MEDJIDIEH

"THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE," by George Macdonald, LL.D. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—In "The Marquis of Lossie" we have that sequel to "Malcolm," which at its close Mr. MacDonald said would be necessary to complete his hero's history. It is so essentially a sequel that though a brief sketch of the situation is indeed given for the benefit of readers who may have no acquaintance with the former work, it is certain that without such acquaintance it cannot be properly appreciated, or even understood. In fact the two tales form a connected whole, and ought to be read together. It seems to us, as we said in reviewing "Malcolm," that this fashion of working is open to many objections on the ground both of art and of convenience, and we doubt if Mr. Macdonald could find any authorities for it, at any rate among modern novelists of a high order. Scott's "Abbot" is indeed styled a sequel to his "Monastery," but the interest is new, the bulk of the characters are new altogether, and the few among them whom we have met in the earlier work are so transformed by time as to seem virtually new creations. And though Thackeray and Mr. Anthony Trollope have been fond of introducing the characters of former stories upon the stage, these always play a subordinate part, and are little concerned with the main action. However, having freed our soul by this criticism, we can have no hesitation in pronouncing "The Marquis of Lossie" a work of much power and beauty, and one that could only have been conceived and wrought out by a writer who is altogether a poet in feeling, and possesses in no small measure the poet's faculty of expression. It will be remembered that Malcolm's father, the fifth Marquis of Lossie, whilst formally acknowledging on his deathbed the young fisherman as his lawful son and heir, bids him with his dying breath "be good" to his half-sister, the Lady Florimel, whom all the world, except the three or four in the secret, will accept as Marchioness of Lossie in her own right. This charge, it is needless to say, Malcolm would have taken upon himself, even if it had not been thus solemnly impressed upon him, but he is thus brought face to face with a divided duty. He must "be good" to Florimel, and to proclaim himself Marquis of Lossie is not only to take from her the title she has supposed her own, but to declare her illegitimate, his own mother, believed dead by her husband, having been still alive when Florimel was born. But he has a duty also to his poor fishermen of Portlossie and Scaurnose, among whom he has lived for twenty years as one of themselves, and whose needs he knows so well. He has now the power to help them, and having it holds himself bound to exercise it, but to do this he must tell the truth, and declare himself what he is, Marquis of Lossie. His decision is to get admission into his sister's service as groom, and thus to be near her, and to endeavour by steady devotion and usefulness so to win his way to her esteem and confidence that when the necessary disclosure has to be made, she may feel that if she loses title and position she gains instead a faithful and tender brother. How it fares with Malcolm in the execution of his design and under what circumstances the great disclosure is finally made it would take far too much space to tell here. Of course, a marquis bred-up as a fisher-lad, who, whilst appearing in the eyes of men as a groom, reads Epictetus in the original Greek, and is half-parson, half-poet in his discourse, is not a personage to stumble upon any day, and it is quite in keeping that so strange a being should have a strange story. But when a novelist lets us understand that he is not attempting a picture of contemporary manners, but dealing with those great truths of human nature which lie below all the passing fashions of the day, he need not feel himself trammelled by considerations of ordinary and commonplace probability. It may, no doubt, be said that here, as elsewhere, the author is too apt to sink the novelist in the preacher, but it must be remembered that the novel is after all a somewhat elastic form of art, and that if Mr. Macdonald were not allowed to render his stories "lay sermons" he would probably think it labour thrown away to write them; and also that something of the nature of such "lay sermons" was perhaps needed to bring out the deep seriousness and religiousness and the constant aspiration after perfection in Malcolm, that give his character its true dignity and nobility, and cause him to seem as much in his right place as Marquis of Lossie, as he was in Blue Peter's fishing-boat. We had intended to call attention to the beauty of some particular scenes and phrases—as the moon "at length blooming out of the darkening sky"—but our limits forbid, and we must be satisfied with recommending this very fine work to the attention of all discriminating readers.

"The Pilot and His Wife;" translated from the Norwegian of Jonas Lie, by G. L. Tottenham (Blackwood).—This is a work of very high and delicate finish, and, when once the author gets, so to say, into his swing, of great and unflagging interest. Its translation must have been a task of no ordinary difficulty from the nautical terms which so abound throughout, but Mr. Tottenham has accomplished it with so much success that it is very rarely indeed that we are even conscious that it is a translation we are reading. The interest of the tale turns mainly on the irrational—almost insane—jealousy displayed by the brooding, suspicious, savage-tempered, but passionately-loving pilot Salvé Kristiansen towards his beautiful and faithful wife Elizabeth. It is not that he insults her by absolute doubts of her fidelity, but he feels unworthy of her, and thinks that with her beauty and gifts of mind she must look down upon a common seaman such as he is, and be always comparing him disadvantageously with other men whom she might have married had she chosen. The torture which his constant unspoken distrust causes his wife, and the desperate remedy to which at last she has recourse—screwing herself up "to have it out with him" once for all, and thereby bringing full sunshine into their home and lives—is all admirably described, with a profusion of those slight but subtle touches that show the artist. The sea scenes are singularly graphic and vivid; in particular we may mention Salvé's adventures previous to his marriage on board the Stars and Stripes, and the wreck of the Apollo, through his mad and reckless sailing. Altogether the book is one of great merit, and the freshness of its tone and character form an additional attraction.

"Marriage and Married Life," by "Isha" (2 vols.: Remington and Co.).—This story is described on the title-page as "a novel for girls about to marry," its aim being to set forth that marriage instead of being the end of a woman's life, after which she has nothing to do but rest and be thankful, is in truth but the threshold to all its deeper interests. The moral, we should say, was a sound one, and it is not unskilfully illustrated in the stories of the matrimonial experiences of the three heroines of the tale, all of whom suffer more or less either from their own fault or the fault of their spouses. It is a pity that a writer who must be credited with the possession of good sense, insight into character, and some power of thought, and whose "talk" is written in English easy and forcible enough, should too often, when she speaks in her own person, have thought fit to adopt a style so intolerably ponderous and involved. In the earlier portion of the book sentences of twenty lines or more the construing of which demands quite a painful effort, are of the commonest occurrence. Let "Isha" cure herself of this fault, and we think she may have it in her to do well in the future.

THE EARLY FRENCH TEXT SOCIETY

WHILE the increasing interest taken in the history of our literature renders it possible for an "Early English Text Society" to point with pride to thirteen years' good work achieved, to say nothing of other flourishing societies founded to illustrate our greatest poets, English students are bound to hold out the hand of welcome to their younger sister on the other side the Channel. The "Société des Anciens Textes Français" is yet little known in this country; although but in its third year it has given earnest of valuable labours in a vast field, that of the literature of France from its first monuments to the Renaissance; and considering the ancient interchange between the two countries, the various influence of each upon the literature of the other from Norman times to Chaucer and onwards, Englishmen may well take interest in the efforts to bring into daylight the early works of a language to which they themselves owe not a little.

The scope of the Society is wide. In the words of the accomplished secretary it includes "not only works strictly literary, composed for instruction and pleasure, but all writings in the vulgar tongue;" chansons de geste, romances, lives of saints, and holy legends, the lyric poetry of the trouvères and others, the religious and comic drama of the Middle Ages, prose works, poets as yet imperfectly printed or not at all,—all these it is intended shall receive illustration and justice from the Society's publications. Beginning at the beginning—as becomes a body which numbers among its leading members philologists and archivistes—it gives us a handsome album containing nine photographic fac similes of the oldest existing writings of the French language, of the ninth and tenth centuries, to accompany which a philological commentary is promised. We then have a charming volume of "Chansons du 15ᵉ Siècle," edited from a MS. in the Paris National Library, by M. Gaston Paris, popular songs belonging to a time when, as the editor points out, "an entirely new spring of poetry, abundant, fresh, and sweet, wells forth in certain provinces, and ripples gently on. It is the true French stream, which escapes through a crack, rather than pour itself into those stately machines which would make it into fountains and cascades to delight the eyes of princes." To help us to hear these songs as they were sung by the French country people, M. Gevaert, Director of the Conservatoire of Brussels, has transcribed from the MS. into modern musical notation the melodies for all the poems, 143 in number, the volume being completed by two fac similes of the original notation. Will some English lover of song work out these promising materials? Of the other four issues of the Society, three belong to the romances of the fourteenth century, "Brun de la Montaigne," edited by M. Paul Meyer, and "Guillaume de Palerne," by M. Michelant, who has given valuable assistance to the editors of the English version of this curious story, known here as the romance of William and the Werwolf. "Brun de la Montaigne" is a fragment of a romance, otherwise unknown, which gives the adventures in love and war of the hero Brun, who, having received various gifts from the forest fairies (one being, of course, malignant) at his birth, bears the charm of these throughout his life. Unfortunately only a part of this pretty story (in which Morgana, the cousin or sister of King Arthur, plays a part) remains, but for its peculiarities of form and verse it has been rescued by the editor from oblivion. The collection of forty miracle plays, known as the "Miracles de Nostre Dame, par Personnages," in the Paris National Library, furnishes the first issue of a work which will extend to six or seven volumes, under the editorship of MM. G. Paris and U. Robert, and to the indefatigable labours of the former is also owing an edition of the prose "Roman des Sept Sages, the "Seven Wise Men" of our childhood.

CARLINGFORD LOUGH AND THE MOURNE MOUNTAINS

THIS beautiful and romantic district is situated on the east coast of Ireland, nearly opposite Holyhead, from which it can be reached in about six hours' sail, and it is thus within easy reach of Liverpool, London, and other parts of the United Kingdom. It is full of natural beauties attractive alike to the eye of the artist and the tourist, and its historic associations should render it of equal interest to the antiquarians. Leaving Euston by a fast express train soon after five o'clock, and the leading provincial towns at corresponding hours, we travel viâ Chester to Holyhead, whence we embark on one of a service of fine steamers, specially built for the cross-channel passage by the London and North-Western Railway Company. The voyage is a pleasant one, and we disembark at Greenore, a station erected on a plot of land "stolen from the sea." Here we find a commodious hotel and every modern convenience, and, taking our seats in a train awaiting us, run along the edge of Carlingford Lough to the old town of Carlingford, on the southern shore of the bay. Carlingford was a station of considerable importance at the time when the English first attained ascendancy over Ireland, and most of the early houses were constructed as fortalices or castles, because, the town being situated on the frontier of the Pale, was constantly exposed to attacks from the "Irish enemy." Its castle dates from the time of King John; and its ancient abbey which was founded in 1305 by the Earl of Ulster, is now a most picturesque ruin, the only part still standing being the long aisles and central belfry, with their immense pointed windows. The town has sadly fallen from its old-world importance, and it is now a quiet, unpretending little place, whose inhabitants depend chiefly for maintenance on the local traffic and oyster fishery, the Carlingford oysters being very famous for the extreme delicacy of their flavour.

Continuing our journey, we leave the train at Omeath, and cross the lough by a ferry to Warrenpoint, a fashionable watering-place at the head of the bay, which obtained its name from a rabbit warren which formerly existed here.

At Warrenpoint we enter the tram-cars of Messrs. Norton and Shaw, and drive among the beautiful scenery at the head of the bay, past an obelisk to the memory of General Ross, of which we give a view, to Rostrevor, one of the most charming watering places in Ireland, or, indeed, in the United Kingdom, and one which is deservedly growing in popularity. The scenery around is of the most delightful description, and from the summit of Slieve Bân, which rises almost perpendicularly above the town, a brilliant panoramic view is obtained of the whole range of the Mourne Mountains. About halfway down this mountain stands a huge boulder of granite some thirty tons in weight. It is called "Cloughmore" or "Cloech-meur," the finger-stone, and its position is accounted for by a singular legend to the effect that the Irish giant, Fin McCoul, having agreed to fight a certain Scottish giant, the latter came over to meet him, when Finn McCoul picked this "finger-stone" from the top of Carlingford mountain, eight miles away, and pitched it towards his opponent by way of greeting. The story has two endings, the listeners, we presume, being at liberty to take their choice. One is that the big Scotchman was so frightened at this feat of strength that he at once ran away home; the other gives him credit for courage, but says that he was conquered and chained Prometheus-like to Carlingford Mountain, upon the sloping side of which the impression of his huge frame is still to be seen.

From Rostrevor we travel over the romantic district of the Mourne Mountains by means of Norton and Shaw's "long cars," of which our engraving conveys a good idea, passing to Killowen, a picturesque hamlet, where stands an old chapel celebrated as the scene of the famous Yelverton marriage. The place at which Major Yelverton and Theresa Longworth landed on the morning of their wedding-day is shown to tourists, and the footpath by which they reached the chapel is still known to the peasantry as "Yelverton's Walk." The other towns in the district are Greencastle, Kilkeel, Newcastle, Castlewellan, and Rathfriland, all of which afford beautiful kaleidoscopic views of the Mourne Mountains. We have no space to describe them in detail, but even had we space, language would prove utterly inadequate to give anything like a fair idea of the glorious magnificence of mountain, lake, and ocean, which appeal with such irresistible charm to the enraptured vision of the beholder. The magic

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

9, Manchester Square.
I have examined Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Check Action as applied to their Pianos, and consider it a most ingenious and valuable invention, which cannot fail to meet with success.
SIR JULIUS BENEDICT.

45, Blandford Square, N.W.
I have much pleasure in testifying to the great excellence of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianofortes. Their "Perfect Check Repeater" produces a touch that is absolute perfection, and which is unsurpassed by any other maker, native or foreign.
SYDNEY SMITH.

6, St. Mary Abbot's Terrace, Kensington, W.
To Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.
I have much pleasure in testifying to the efficiency of Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Patent Check Action for Pianofortes, which I consider a very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted.
BRINLEY RICHARDS.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,
with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

The effect which "the Perfect Check Repeater Action," patented by Messrs. Brinsmead, produces on the touch, is everything that can be desired by an artist. It appears to me the most important invention of modern times, both for freedom of execution and expression.

I have equal pleasure in referring to Messrs. Brinsmead's New Metal Back Pianofortes, which, as regards durability, richness, brilliancy, equality and contrast of tone, by far surpass Pianofortes of the ordinary construction at a much higher price.

I will not fail to draw the attention of Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian, of Schleswig Holstein, to these inventions the next opportunity which may present itself.
CHARLES JOHN [illegible],
Conductor of the Philharmonic Society,
Capetown, Africa.

Bognor, Sussex.
The touch and tone of the Pianofortes manufactured by John Brinsmead and Sons are alike admirable, and having thoroughly examined their instruments, I have much pleasure in highly recommending them. In the present day there is so much imposition practised upon the musical public that the purchase of a Pianoforte that will give permanent satisfaction is a very important matter.
DR. T. LLOYD FOWLE, M.A.

I have great pleasure in certifying to the fine, rich, and powerful tone of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianos, also to the great improvements they have succeeded in attaining.
As a Professor of the Harp, I can safely add that the mellow tones of their Short Iron Gold Medal Grands blend charmingly with the instrument I profess, and form a delicious ensemble.
FREDERICK CHATTERTON,
Harpist to the Queen.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,
with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

The Close, Hereford.
Dear Sirs,—Your Patent Action is one of the best I have met with. This combined with the equal tone of your instruments must commend them to those desiring a first-class Pianoforte at a reasonable price.
Yours faithfully,
G. TOWNSHEND SMITH,
Organist of Hereford Cathedral, and Director of the Hereford Festival.

8, Lower Rock Gardens, Brighton.
Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.
Gentlemen,—It gives me the greatest pleasure to state that I consider the instruments manufactured by you to be most excellent in tone, touch, and quality of material. I particularly admire your Pianos with the Patent Check Repeater Action and new Grand Construction, being a wonderful improvement upon the old system. In my opinion your firm having been successful in creating so good a touch to the Cottage Pianoforte as that usually accorded to the Grand. All those I have chosen have given the greatest satisfaction to the purchasers.
I am, gentlemen, yours very truly,
W. KUHE.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons. Dresden.
I have great pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your instruments. Your newly patented system, "the Perfect Check Repeater Action," when applied to these Pianos, greatly increases their value, and I have no doubt that these valuable improvements will excite general attention and admiration.
HERMANN [illegible].

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,
with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

80, St. Thomas Street, Weymouth.
I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the perfection of Messrs. J. Brinsmead and Sons' New Pianoforte Action, which, for promptness in repetition, and general excellence in touch, surpasses anything of the kind I have yet seen, whilst the extreme simplicity of the mechanism by which such important results are attained is an additional recommendation.
BOYTON SMITH.

To Messrs. J. Brinsmead and Sons, 18, Wigmore Street, W.
Gentlemen,—I have much pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your upright and horizontal Grand Pianofortes, as they are simply perfect in touch and tone.
[illegible] GUILLAUME,
Chevalier de [illegible],
Examiner-General of the Ancient Bourbonnic Society in the Royal Academy of Fine Arts at Naples, Honorary Member of the Musical Academies of Rome, Venice, &c., formerly Director-General of all Military Music for both Infantry and Cavalry of the Line to the Army of the Two Sicilies.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS
with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.
"The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually."—Illustrated London News.

pencil of the artist can do more, much more, than the pen of the most facile writer, but even that falls far short of the splendid and beauteous grandeur of Nature which must be seen to be appreciated. We have only to add that we have culled these brief notes from the pages of a guidebook, which has just been published by Messrs. Norton and Shaw, of London, Liverpool, and Belfast, who have organised a system of personally-conducted tours in the district; and we think that all those who are in any doubt as to the direction in which they shall turn faces when they leave town for their accustomed summer holidays, cannot do better than pay a visit to this lovely spot.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED

THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. H. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of F. Werner by Mrs. Parker. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and use of information. The gloomiest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN illustrates men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 29 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

The 'Pickwick,' 'Owl,' and 'Waverley' were named;

In ease the next, in elegance the last.

OUR ARTIST'S NOTES AT THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SHOW AT LIVERPOOL

Topics of the Week

ACROSS THE BALKANS.——Most people expected that Turkey would be ultimately overmatched by Russia, but few thought that she would make such a poor fight of it as she has done hitherto. Looking back to the events of the last few weeks it is easy to perceive how much more a Power possessed of the resources of Turkey might have accomplished to bar the Russian invasion. Even supposing that it was unadvisable to occupy Roumania, instead of allowing the enemy to traverse that country as easily as if they had been a party of Cook's tourists, the Turks might have made a strenuous defence on the Danube. Independent of their army, their fleet of gun-boats and monitors, if properly handled, might have performed invaluable service on the great river barrier. But they did nothing, or next to nothing; and no one probably was more surprised than the Russians themselves, who were prepared to sacrifice thousands of lives in forcing a passage, at the feeble resistance with which they met. Safely landed on the Turkish side of the Danube, the Russians proceeded with equal ease, and secured an almost unopposed passage across the Balkans, that famous range where at least it was expected the Turks would make a determined stand. It is true that the advanced guard have left some formidable fortresses behind them, but Nikopol has already fallen, and Rustchuk is seriously threatened. Abdul Kerim may have a "plan," but "plans" have an ill-omened sound after General Trochu's experiences, as they are apt to require time and other conditions which the enemy are not always inclined to accord. As in Armenia, early success may possibly be followed by subsequent reverses; but the circumstances of the two invasions are very different, as in Asia the Russians underrated the enemy's forces, whereas in Europe they seem to have taken every precaution to insure that they shall not be out-numbered

THE CONSERVATIVE UNION IN FRANCE.——The policy which the French Ministry mean to adopt in the approaching elections is now known. The Prefects have received directions to support no candidate who "unfurls the flag of one of the parties which aspire to power in 1880." The orthodox colours are to be those of the MacMahonites, and the MacMahonites alone. Each member of the "union" may have his private hopes, but he is to say nothing of them; he is merely to proclaim his loyalty to the Marshal. On the whole, the Republicans have little reason to regret this decision. The Marshal's is not a powerful name to conjure with. He serves the purpose of a stopgap very well; but nobody can pretend to be enthusiastic about him, or suppose that without him the France of so many centuries would be ruined. There are, however, signs that the "union" will be much less complete than the Government wish. The Legitimists have made it very plain that they will do nothing to strengthen the hands of the Bonapartists. M. de Franclieu has boldly declared that he and his co-religionists would greatly prefer the Republic to the Empire. They know that the former will not fight their battles; but then they also know that the latter was the direct cause of the misfortunes of their Church. Through the Empire Italy was united, and owing to its blunders Germany became powerful enough to contend with the priests. If so much was done in the past, what might not the future bring with it if an Emperor were again at the Tuileries? These jealousies are not likely to be diminished as the time for appealing to the nation arrives, and if not, the Duc de Broglie may prove to have been, against his will, the best friend the Republic ever had.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.——We are anxious to keep silence concerning the merits or demerits of this institution while the official inquiry is proceeding, but at the same time a few general remarks may not be out of place. It seems to us that such an exceptional incident as the suicide of a boy proves little or nothing as to the state of discipline of a school. Think of the innumerable miseries boys have undergone in former days when teaching was pitilessly enforced by the lash, and when the tyranny of the pedagogue was replaced after school hours by the bullying of schoolfellows. Think of the notorious Yorkshire schools of the last generation (effectually exposed by Charles Dickens in "Nicholas Nickleby"), where friendless little creatures were doomed to neglect, cruelty, and semi-starvation. The most pessimist Blue cannot compare modern Christ's Hospital with these places, yet boy-suicides were almost if not altogether unknown in them. We do not say that there has been no bullying in Christ's Hospital, we merely wish to show that the suicide of poor little Gibbs does not (as the public seem to think) prove that bullying of a specially atrocious character existed. Again, it seems to us scarcely fair to impugn a whole school for the deeds which may be done in one part of it. A public schoolboy lives, in some respects, in a very narrow world. He is far more affected for happiness or misery by his dormitory companions than by the school at large, and so fearful are boys of being regarded as "sneaks," that one or two ill-conditioned fellows may cause a vast amount of wretchedness without a syllable of complaint reaching the higher powers. This may have been the case with Gibbs, and if so, it is scarcely reasonable that an isolated case of tyranny should be levelled as an indictment against the entire establishment.

OUR DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.——We had thought it was an almost exploded idea that the British representative abroad is a person who absorbs a vast amount of money and does nothing for it. This venerable notion, however, appeared in full vigour the other evening in Committee of Supply, when Mr. Rylands and a few who agree with him thought it their duty to call out for a reduction of expenditure in the diplomatic service. A worse time for any such demand could not have been chosen, for, as it happens, we have just had bitter experience of the consequences of insufficient information respecting what goes on abroad. It is hardly too much to say that if early and authentic reports had reached England last year respecting the Bulgarian atrocities the antagonism that sprang up between the different parties in the State would not have been half so intense, and probably the national policy would now have been much more clear and firm than it actually is. There can be little doubt that the Consular service will have to be considerably strengthened in the East, and for our part we should be glad to see the country still more efficiently represented in all the important nations. The curse of John Bull is that in quiet times he thinks so little about his neighbours. He has so high an opinion of himself, and really plays so splendid a rôle on the stage of the world, that unless his attention is violently attracted he deems it beneath him to inquire what foreigners are about. The result is that when anything of great moment happens he astonishes mankind by the strangest antics. He knows nothing of the broad general causes of the events which surprise him; he is merely startled, thinks his interests are in danger, takes a side with characteristic vehemence, says one thing to-day and to-morrow does quite another. England can never pursue a policy worthy of her until the people are better instructed in foreign affairs; and the diplomatic service might be so managed as to convey the necessary instruction in the best possible form.

FREE BRIDGES.——Bridges which have been built for the purpose of making a profit out of the tolls levied cannot be freed by any financial hocus-pocus, and the reason why the passage of the Toll Bridges Act (which has just received the Royal Assent) has been so long delayed, is that it has been no easy matter to discover how to raise the money for buying out the existing proprietors. A victim has at length been found, in the shape of the Metropolitan ratepayer, and on his broad and multitudinous back the burden will be laid. The sacrifice is not equal to that of freeing the Russian serfs. Still, the sum required (1,500,000*l.*, for which we shall have to pay extra rates for the next half century) is not a fleabite, even for gigantic London. The people who will really benefit will be the very poor, those who twice a day, as they went to and from their labour, had to hand over their hard-earned coppers to relentless men in white aprons. The middle and upper classes will pay far more in rates than they will save in tolls. Rents on the Surrey side will no doubt rise perceptibly, and so the poor may not after all save much out of their bridge-halfpence. Nevertheless, it is right that the change should be made, and it accords with modern maxims that such charges should be borne by the whole community rather than by the actual users. One thing we shall regret. At present, Waterloo Bridge forms an agreeable resort for those in search of quiet. Fresh air and unrivalled views are obtainable from its uncompromising stone seats. The dust (which is always there in mysterious abundance) is a slight drawback, it is true, and so is the suspicion, entertained by the passing policeman, that you are contemplating suicide. Nevertheless, the Bridge of Waterloo is an agreeable lounge, and we shall feel sorry when those funny little red omnibuses vanish (as they probably will with the toll); and when the blind man ceases to read the Bible in sonorous tones from raised letters in one of the recesses; in short, when the old bridge becomes a commonplace, roaring, jostling thoroughfare, like its brother at the bottom of King William Street.

THE ITALIAN STREET CHILDREN.——The Charity Organisation Society deserves great credit for the care with which it has collected the facts relating to the unfortunate Italian children who are brought over in multitudes to this country to make a living for their padroni. Everybody is familiar with them. There is often something extremely attractive in their appearance and manner. They seem gay and light-hearted, and many a coin is dropped into their tambourines by persons who are usually stern in complying with the laws of political economy on the subject of begging. They remind passers-by of a sunnier land than ours, and brighter and more sociable manners. Now that the actual circumstances of the children have been made known it is to be hoped that only the feeblest class of sentimentalists will continue to give them money. The padroni, it seems, enter into a verbal contract with the parents of their victims, and then the little creatures have to make their way on foot across the Continent, sometimes arriving here in such a condition that they die of sheer exhaustion. When they have started on their miserable career their lot is that of slaves. They are unmercifully beaten if they do not bring in a proper sum of money; they are lodged in vile houses; and in regard to their morals the worst that can be imagined is nearest the truth. If the parents have the remotest suspicion of what happens to their children, no words can be strong enough to express their baseness; indeed, in any case, their conduct is utterly inhuman. But that does not make it the less our duty to put down so infamous a system. The Government may do something, but the effectual remedy is in the hands of the public, and that is—never to give a farthing to any of these poor boys and girls, however cheerful and attractive they may seem. If the business ceases to pay, it will cease to exist. Any one who encourages it now will simply prove his own selfishness.

AN AMERICAN STRIKE.——Perhaps there is more oxygen in the air of the New World than of the Old; at any rate, both Nature and Man are more excitable there than here. According to a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, the thunderstorms of England are mere pop-guns and rushlight flashes compared to the tremendous tempests of Iowa, which, moreover, are repeated nearly every day through the summer. Again, the politico-theological feuds which date from the Battle of the Boyne, and which are dying out in their native island, blaze forth with fresh intensity in the bracing climate of the Canadian Dominion, and have just set the City of Montreal in an uproar. Lastly, a strike of railway employés is apt to assume very different aspects in this country and in the United States. Here it is happily an affair of rare occurrence, and seldom inflicts more than a slight temporary inconvenience on the general public. Men hang about grumbling and sullen for a while, but soon mutual concessions bring all, except a few malcontents, back to their work. The story of the late strike on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, on the contrary, reads like a leaf from the Great Civil War, and the violence of the strikers seems the more remarkable, because the bulk of the Company's servants had accepted the 10 per cent. reduction. This violence, and the bloodshed by which it was accompanied, is traceable to several causes, which are fortunately either absent or less conspicuous on this side of the water. Our people are not in the habit of carrying firearms; between employers and employed there are powerful bonds of union arising from common lineage and nativity, whereas in the United States the labourers are too apt to be regarded by the native Americans, who act as their workmasters, as a horde of aliens; while, lastly, the bitterness of the strikers is often increased by a belief, possibly ill-founded, but not entirely unjustified by previous examples, that the "bosses" who reduce the men's wages are not very scrupulous as to how they feather their own nests. Altogether, it is plain that the most violent class animosities may exist in a community which enjoys universal suffrage, and owns neither nobles, nor Established Church, nor King.

THE DOMESTIC ECONOMY CONGRESS.——Few Congresses have met for so good a purpose as that which assembled this week in Birmingham. Professor Huxley in no way exaggerated when he declared that "some of the greatest evils of the workman are traceable to mere physical agencies which could be removed by energy, patience, and frugality." The working classes as a rule know nothing whatever of the laws of health. Their food is badly cooked; their dwellings are badly ventilated and drained; and their children are often, from sheer carelessness, so insufficiently clad, that it is impossible for them to grow up strong and vigorous. It is because the outward conditions of their lives are so mean and repelling that very many working men spend their evenings in the public-house, and bring themselves and their families to ruin. These facts are pretty well understood, but hitherto they have not led to sufficiently definite action. Social reformers have had too little system in their work; and the world generally has been inclined to content itself with vague aspirations. There is but one way in which a thorough change can be effected; and that is by beginning with the young. Those who have long gone on in the old way have acquired too fixed habits to adopt different methods; but there is no reason why the new generation should be allowed to pass into manhood and womanhood without a knowledge of simple laws that would alter the whole complexion of their lives. Now that education is all but universal, it would be very easy for properly-trained teachers to communicate ideas and aptitudes in accordance with the best lights and the acknowledged needs of the time. We have got far beyond the notion that education ought to be something altogether apart from real life. It is now generally acknowledged that its first object is to prepare children to make the most of the circumstances in the midst of which they are likely to spend their days. The object of the Congress was to force upon public attention the importance of the movement, and to suggest practical methods of reaching the desired end. We believe it has been very successful, and cannot doubt that the Government will by and by see the propriety of following in the direction indicated by the most enlightened opinion.

LONDON BALCONIES.——In the case of the painter at Kensington, who stepped from the drawing-room of the house he was engaged in decorating on to the balcony, which gave way under him, and precipitated him to the ground, the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death." A verdict of manslaughter against the landlord of the premises would have been far more appropriate, and would have tended to stir up owners of house-property to look after their balconies, which in hundreds, if not thousands of cases, are unfit for the use for which they are professedly intended. A balcony which cannot be safely walked upon is not only a sham, but a most dangerous sham, and it would be better to get rid altogether of these appendages to our houses, unless they are kept in good order. Of course, the real reason of this neglect is easily discoverable. In our smoky, chilly atmosphere balconies are, as a rule, rarely used, and hence they are allowed to fall into decay. If some exceptionally attractive sight, such as a Royal procession, for which preparations are made long beforehand, is expected to fill the balconies of any given thoroughfare with spectators, prudent occupiers usually take care to ascertain that the supports are sound, and so accidents are rare on these occasions. The real danger is when people are drawn to their balconies in crowds by some sudden and unlooked-for attraction. The upshot of our advice is that people should first of all ensure that their balconies are sound, and then should make far more use of them than they now do. Smoky fresh air is better than no fresh air at all, and very few Londoners, women especially, get as much out-door air as they ought to have.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY AT LIVERPOOL

THE Annual Show of this Society was held last week in Newsham Park, where the local authorities had liberally allotted no less than seventy-five acres of land to be used as a show-yard. The greater part of this immense space was occupied by what is technically called "dead stock," consisting of machinery and implements used in farming; but there was in addition a very fair show of horses, horned cattle, sheep and pigs. The number of exhibits in the first-mentioned department, in which no money prizes were offered, was larger than in any previous year, and the gold medal of the Society will be awarded to the most efficient sheaf-binding machine, the competition for which will take place at harvest time in the neighbourhood of Liverpool. The cattle-judging took place on the first and second days of the show, when the parading of the animals in the rings was naturally the great attraction to the visitors, who attended in large numbers in spite of the very unsettled condition of the weather. One of the most effective sights of the whole week was witnessed on Saturday, when there was a magnificent procession of Liverpool cart horses in their working harness.

The annual meeting of the Shorthorn Society was held on Thursday in the Council tent, under the presidency of Lord Skelmersdale. The report and accounts were adopted, and the chairman, Colonel Kingscote, M.P., and other members strongly urged the importance of an unceasing effort being made to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease, as being a scourge which cost the country an enormous amount every year, and which was even more insidious and injurious than rinderpest.

THE WINDSOR REVIEW

THE review before Her Majesty in the Great Park, Windsor, on the 10th inst., was in every way a splendid success. The weather was magnificent, the ground in excellent order, crowds of delighted spectators were present, and the troops, some 15,000 strong, who had marched from Aldershot, breaking the journey for the night some at Ascot Heath and others at Cobham, looked as fresh and trim as though they had just turned out of barracks. The Royal salute sounded soon after five o'clock, and as Her Majesty's carriage came in sight the strains of the National Anthem broke forth from all the bands. The Queen was accompanied by Princess Beatrice, and the Duke of Cambridge and Prince Christian rode in front of the carriage. After passing down the lines a position was taken up beneath the "review oak," and the march past began. All went by in admirable order, the 1st Life Guards being especially noticeable as having discarded their buckskin breeches and high boots for the more serviceable pantaloons and low boots used by other cavalry regiments. The Lancers, too, came in for a good share of cheering as they went by, with fluttering pennons, in faultless line. The infantry looked exceedingly well, and seemed to impress Her Majesty, for as it went by the second time she stood up in her carriage as if to get a better view. The crowd cheered again and again as the final royal salute was given by the whole mass of troops, sabres and bayonets flashing in the sunlight, and the familiar "God Save the Queen" again rose upon the air. Her Majesty bowed in acknowledgment of the salute, and, the display being over, the Royal carriage drove off towards the Castle. Among the visitors were the Comte and Comtesse de Paris; but few other foreigners of distinction were present, and there was scarcely a foreign uniform to be seen.

THE WAR IN THE EAST

WITH THE TURKS—THE BOMBARDMENT OF RUSTCHUK

ONE of the saddest incidents of the present campaign has been the bombardment of Rustchuk by the Russians, who have inflicted considerable damage upon the unfortunate town and its inhabitants. The bombardment was somewhat unexpected, and at present there seems to have been no adequate reason for inflicting so much devastation and suffering as were effected by the Giurgevo batteries, which up to the 23rd ult. confined their labours to bombarding the forts and the redoubts. Thus, when the first shell fell on the town on that day, it was thought that it was a piece of bad marksmanship; but a second and third speedily dispelled this illusion, and soon the missiles began to fall thickly upon the town, the British Consulate and the Military Hospital being apparently selected as special points de mire, notwithstanding that they were respectively surmounted by the British ensign and the hospital flag of the Turkish Army. One of our sketches represents a shell falling into a ward of the Military Hospital, or Hislar Hané. "The missile," writes our artist, "came crashing through the roof, and penetrating the floor, fell into the cellar, where it exploded, fortunately without hurting anybody." When it was found that the hospital was being fired at, the sick and wounded were removed to safer quarters, the Turkish women displaying especial courage in the task. As for the British Consulate, the Daily Telegraph correspondent writes that it was one of the most conspicuous buildings, while over it floated an enormous Union Jack—no mere rag, but a huge banner six yards long and three yards wide, which from the other side of the river might be distinctly seen without the aid of glasses. "The first shot thrown at it," he continues, "found the range, for it plumped through a large portion of the house. Then came a second, this time into the consul's office, destroying everything there; and a third, which tore one side of the house nearly in pieces, after which others fell all round till the house was a wreck. Four huge missiles had struck it and knocked the place literally to pieces—the while that the much-vaunted British flag waved over it." Our sketch represents the Consulate on 26th ult. On the following day, our artist tells us, it was still further damaged. It is only fair to state that the French, German, and Austrian Consulates also suffered, although to a less degree.

WITH HOBART PASHA—A RUSSIAN SPY

THIS sketch represents an incident at Sulina during a recent visit there of Hobart Pasha. A Russian spy has been caught, and has been brought by some zaptiehs or policemen to the Konak or Prefecture for examination by Hobart Pasha. The man, our artist declares, was chiefly noticeable for his ugliness. One of the chief dangers the Turks have had to contend with on the Danube has been the great prevalence of spies, and the difficulty of detecting them, as the Bulgarian peasantry, in many cases heartily sympathising with the invaders, voluntarily keep them well informed of all the Turkish movements.

WITH THE RUSSIANS—IN THE TRENCHES, OLTENITZA

THESE sketches have been taken at the Russian batteries, Oltenitza, which for some time past have kept up a vigorous artillery duel with the opposite town Turtukai. In the first sketch one Russian soldier is represented making that favourite Muscovite beverage—tea. Having taken off his boot, he has gathered the top of the leg over the little funnel which holds the charcoal in the tea urn, and is pumping the boot up and down as a bellows, while one of his colleagues is holding a dummy in an exposed position to draw the fire of the Turks, another being ready to fire when they see the Turk taking aim opposite. The pit is used as a shelter from pieces of shell.

The second sketch portrays a shepherd's hut, made of rushes and sticks, and situated near the camp, in range of the shells which fall daily. "The shepherds, nevertheless," writes our artist, "go on with their occupations as usual, milking the sheep to make the cheese. Behind the hut is a pen full of sheep which are let through one by one behind the two men who seize and milk them. It is curious to see these occupations of peaceful shepherds calmly going on while the shells are dropping at a few yards to the right and left. It is the Demon of War in the lap of the Goddess of Peace."

"A DAY IN THE COUNTRY"

A COMPARISON of a map of London of the present year with one, say, of the year 1837 will show how rapidly London has spread over the green fields within a period which is quite within the recollection of middle-aged people. In 1837 boys and girls who wanted to exchange bricks and mortar for fields and hedgerows could accomplish their design even from the central districts by simply using their legs, and so for town-bred children a specially organised "day in the country" was not such a necessity then as now. In spite of all our boasted improvements, our People's Palaces, and so forth, the children of the poor have, through the inordinate growth of London, lost many cheap and simple pleasures which they then possessed; however, it is useless lamenting over the inevitable, and we must accept the modern "day in the country" as the best substitute we can get for the unofficial rambles in the fields of byegone days. Nor can there be any doubt that these excursions, in spite of the heat, the dust, the noise, and the feverish excitement, do confer a vast amount of pleasure on children who are pent week after week in streets and alleys. The scene represented in our picture was sketched at Richmond Bridge, a locality much favoured by the conductors of these juvenile cavalcades.

STATUE OF KING ALFRED

IN spite of the depressing weather which prevailed on Saturday, the people of Wantage gave a loyal and enthusiastic welcome to the Prince and Princess of Wales. The occasion was a Royal one from whatever point of view considered, the place had regal associations as being the birthplace of the good and wise monarch

THE WAR IN THE EAST: WITH THE TURKS—THE BOMBARDMENT OF RUSTCHUK of ancient times, whose name becomes familiar to us ere we leave the nursery, the statue to be unveiled was the work of Count Gleichen, an artist of royal lineage, and it was the "counterfeit presentment" of the great King Alfred, the brave and wise legislator of old, who first freed his country from a ruthless invader, and afterwards taught his people the rudiments of self-government. No wonder that the inhabitants of Wantage were enthusiastic. They appointed a reception committee, dressed their little town in gay attire of flags and flowers, and packed themselves as closely as possible around the statue in order to hear the speech of the Prince of Wales, the thirty-third-great-grandson of that king to whose memory the memorial was raised. His Royal Highness, after alluding in terms of high eulogy to the virtues, nobility, and patriotism of his ancestor, and to the generosity of Colonel Loyd-Lindsay, the donor of the statue, said that it gave him additional pleasure to unveil it, as it was the work of his cousin, Count Gleichen. After the ceremony the Princess of Wales was presented with a splendid bouquet by a deputation of five tiny little school girls, and the Prince and Princess each planted a memorial tree. The Royal party then drove off to Lockinge, the seat of Colonel Loyd-Lindsay, where a garden party was given.

THE DAHOMEY BLOCKADE—SHIPPING INDEMNITY OIL AT WHYDAH

OWING to the overwhelming interest excited by the War in the East, many of our readers may have almost forgotten our little "difficulty" with the King of Dahomey, which caused us to blockade his coast. The present King, having at length yielded to our demands, has agreed to pay a fine of 500 puncheons of oil, and our sketch, which is by Mr. F. Haynes, second officer of the steamship Volta, represents the shipment of the first instalment of this oil at Whydah. There are a number of French firms established at Whydah, and these firms, being unable to get their produce (palm oil and kernels) off the coast on account of the blockade, were glad to lend some of their oil, which was daily deteriorating in value, to the head men, whom the King of Dahomey considers to be responsible for the insults offered to Mr. Turnbull, which has produced all this difficulty. The French merchants estimate the loss they have sustained by the blockade at 200,000*l.*, and intend, it is said, to lay a claim against the English Government for loss of trade and detention of produce. There was great excitement among the shipping while the oil was being taken off the beach at Whydah. Steam launches from H.M.'s ships were plying about in all directions, taking orders, and towing off the boats with the produce from the surf to the mail steamers. The surf was very high, and the boats continually capsized until it was feared that the Gambia would have to leave before the 200 casks, which formed the first instalment, and the shipment of which would enable the blockade to be raised, had been got on board. Five days later, on May 17th, the Gambia struck on a rock at Cape Palmas, and became a total wreck. The crew were saved, but all the cargo was lost, including, of course, the 200 puncheons of indemnity oil.

CHAMPION SHOTS OF THE ARMY IN INDIA

HAVILDAR JUGGERNAIKLOO, of the 36th Regiment of Madras Native Infantry, was the winner of the gold medal presented by His Excellency Lord Napier of Magdala for competition by the whole of the native troops in the three Presidencies, in 1875. The number of men who actually competed was 6,691, as follows:—

In the Bengal Presidency	3,876
In the Madras Presidency	1,885
In the Bombay Presidency	980

Havildar Juggernaikloo won the medal with a score of 49 points out of a possible score of 56. The gold medal was presented to the Havildar at Bangalore at a parade of all the troops by Major-General Elmhirst, C.B., commanding Mysore Division. This same non-commissioned officer also obtained the silver medal as the best shot in the Madras Army during the annual course of musketry for both the season of 1873-74 and that of 1874-75, making a total score of 185 points each course.—We are indebted for the photograph from which our portrait is taken to Captain Hutchins, Adjutant H.M. 36th Madras Native Infantry.

Colour Sergeant Alfred Woods, 81st Regiment, was the best shot with the Snider rifle in the army for the year 1875-6. He was born at Bishop's Waltham, and joined the 81st Regiment in 1868. His age is twenty-eight years; his score is 110.—Our portrait is from a photograph forwarded to us by Lieut.-Col. Chichester, commanding the 81st Regiment.

THE NAVAL ENCOUNTER IN THE PACIFIC

WE are generally having some little difference with Peru, and the naval encounter of May 29th, when two of our vessels of war actually did that country a service by engaging a rebel ram and forcing her to surrender to the Peruvian squadron, which had previously vainly tried to capture her, bids fair only to form a new subject for diplomatic quarrels. On May 6th the partisans of Nicholas de Pierola, a revolutionary candidate, then undergoing a sentence of banishment, once more raised the standard of rebellion against President Prado, and seizing the most powerful vessel of the navy, the Huascar, steamed away to embark their chief from some Bolivian port, taking the opportunity on the way to intercept and board certain British mail steamers, and forcibly to remove some of the passengers, and taking away quantities of coal. As the Peruvian Government declared itself not responsible for these deeds, Vice-Admiral de Horsey, after consulting with Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires (and, according to some accounts, after telegraphing home), determined to take the protection of British interests into his own hands, and accordingly set sail in H.M.S. Shah, together with H.M.S. Amethyst, both unarmoured vessels, in search of the rebel ram.

In the mean time there had been an engagement between the Huascar and the Peruvian squadron, in which the former escaped without damage, and had succeeded in embarking the revolutionary President, Pierola. On May 29th the two British vessels came up with the Huascar off the town of Ilo, and summoned her to lie to. The Admiral then sent a lieutenant in a small boat to demand the surrender of the vessel to the British flag, stating that he acted solely on behalf of British interests, and in no way in complicity with any Peruvian political party. Pierola politely but firmly declined to surrender, and replied that the British Admiral must do his worst. After giving him five minutes to reconsider his decision, Admiral de Horsey began the action at six minutes past three, the Huascar at once replied, and a general engagement ensued, the Peruvian vessel taking care to keep in front of the town, so that the British vessels had to be careful how they fired, and also to keep in shoal water where the Shah could not follow. Thus for some time the battle was fought at a distance of from 1,500 to 2,500 yards. After two hours, however, the Huascar came into deeper water, and the Shah was then enabled to fire some steady broadsides, and to rake her decks with Gatling guns. The Huascar then tried to ram her adversaries, who, however, by skilful manœuvring avoided all contact. The Peruvian ironclad was exceedingly well managed throughout the fight by two brothers named Curraseo, and the firing is stated to have been extremely good, though neither the Shah nor the Amethyst were hulled during the action. The Huascar also, although struck by some seventy or eighty projectiles, had her armour only once pierced—by a 9-inch shell which killed a sentry during its passage. Her deck, however, was completely cleared of everything save her masts, turret, and smoke stack. A Whitehead torpedo which was sent against her failed to strike her, and about 6 P.M., darkness coming on, the Huascar once more steamed in shore, and both sides ceased firing. Admiral de Horsey, however, despatched a pinnace with a torpedo to blow up the Huascar, but the latter taking advantage of the darkness steamed off to Iquique, where she surrendered to the Peruvian squadron, her commander vainly endeavouring to induce the authorities to join him and attack the British vessels for insulting the Peruvian flag. Pierola's conduct has gained great sympathy for him in Peru, and even President Prado, instead of being grateful to us, has addressed to our Government a demand for satisfaction and indemnification for the "outrage," while the one man killed has been buried with the inscription on his coffin that he died defending his country against the British. To conclude, the Huascar is a British built turret vessel of 4½-inch plating, and mounts two 300-pounder Armstrongs, and two 40 and one 12-pounder.

THE "LORD OF THE ISLES"

THE river and firth of Clyde are pre-eminently the most highly-favoured of tourists' routes in Scotland. The natural beauty of the surrounding scenery is too well known to need description, and as the waters of the firth and the adjacent lochs are rarely ruffled by storms or strong currents, the trip can be enjoyed without the terrors of seasickness. Several new steamers have been added this season to Messrs. Hutcheson's river fleet, among which the Iona has hitherto been deservedly conspicuous, and one of these, the Lord of the Isles, which was launched at the end of May, is represented in our engraving. This vessel, which has been built by Messrs D. and W. Henderson, of Partick, is 246 feet in length, 24 feet in breadth, and has a depth of hold of 8 feet 6 inches. The promenade deck is about 200 feet long, the main saloon is 50 feet long and 16 broad; and the dining saloon, which is immediately under the main cabin, is 60 feet long and 22 feet broad, dining accommodation being provided for 100 persons. The galley is large enough to prepare food for an unlimited number of persons; and the steward's department is under the direction of Mr. David Sutherland, so long superintendent of Messrs. Hutcheson's Highland steamers. In all other points the arrangements of the new vessel are of the most complete character, and it is expected that a speed of twenty miles an hour will be obtained. The Lord of the Isles will leave Greenock Quay daily at 8.15 A.M., proceeding thence from Wemyss Bay to Rothesay, and thence through the Kyles of Bute and Loch Fyne to Inveraray. The trip will be accomplished in about five hours, and passengers can either return with the vessel or by coach and other steamer routes. The Lord of the Isles is commanded by Captain Robert Young, Mr. John M'Lean being purser.

NOTE.——Our engraving entitled "Little Wisdom," published last week, was taken from a photograph by Messrs. Paul Delarue and Co., 5, Percy Street.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——Messrs. Biggar, O'Connor Power, and Parnell, have been addressing large meetings of Irishmen at Liverpool and Manchester on the policy of Irish members in Parliament. Mr. Biggar said that "the Obstructionists" had succeeded without infringing the rules of the House, but if the House of Commons refused to redress the grievances of Ireland, real obstruction might be recommended by the Irish people, and their representatives would be found willing to carry it out. Mr. Parnell remarked that they had not done one-tenth part as much as they might have accomplished in the way of obstruction, but they thought it best to let their opponents off easily. They had never obstructed the proper business of the House. Mr. Power said they had been threatened with "muzzling," but so long as the tax-paying class claimed the right of revising taxation, six members would retain the power of obstructing bad measures. Resolutions were passed at both meetings in favour of a more vigorous and combative policy.—Mr. Gladstone has been taking a holiday trip in Devonshire, and the Liberal Associations of Dartmouth, Plymouth, and Exeter have taken advantage of the opportunity to feast and compliment him upon the achievements of his political career. On Thursday week the Mayor and Corporation of Dartmouth dined with him on board the steamer Dublin Castle, in which he had made the voyage from Gravesend. Mr. Gladstone first returned thanks for his own health and afterwards for that of Mrs. Gladstone, remarking in his latter speech that now ladies' rights were becoming so prominent he felt bound to warn them that along with rights came duties, and they would soon have to respond to such toasts on their own behalf. On landing at Plymouth the ex-Premier met with an enthusiastic reception, and in spite of the rain he mounted the box of a carriage and bare-headed delivered a long speech on general politics, with an occasional unfavourable comment on the foreign policy of the Government. At Exeter, on Friday, another large gathering assembled to welcome Mr. Gladstone and his wife, who were escorted through the town in procession, with torches and music. An address from the local Liberal Association was presented, and Mr. Gladstone responded to it from the balcony of his hotel, the square in front being densely crowded and illuminated by limelight. It rained heavily, but with the aid of an umbrella the orator braved the elements and delighted his audience for fully half an hour.—The anniversary of the battle of the Boyne was celebrated last week at Belfast and various other towns in Ulster, and also in Liverpool, where an unfortunate boy was burnt to death in the streets, his clothes having accidentally caught fire from a "Pope" which some lads were dragging about in a blazing condition. Amongst the resolutions passed at the principal meeting in Belfast was one expressing indignation at the unpatriotic attacks made on the Government in the present crisis of European affairs, and expressing the determination of the Orangemen to support Her Majesty's Ministers in their manly and straightforward policy. Another protested against the claims of the Ultramontane party on the education question, and deprecated the Home Rule movement. —A new political organisation has been started at Bristol. It is chiefly composed of working men, and its programme is exhaustive and uncompromising.—Bradford is actively preparing for the reception of Mr. Bright on the 25th inst. The evening meeting will take place in St. George's Hall, under the presidency of Mr. Isaac Holden.—M. Léon Say is to be a guest of the Cobden Club, at its annual dinner at Greenwich, which takes place next Saturday.—The Southampton Liberal Association is making preparations for a Conference on the Eastern Question. —The first step towards the establishment of the Metropolitan Liberal Union proposed by Mr. J. Beal, has been taken by the formation of "The Westminster Liberal Union," the committee of which will consist of 200 members, with authority to co-operate with similar borough organisations.

THE CAMP AT WIMBLEDON.——The heavy rains have rendered the camp almost as uncomfortable as it was in 1875, but still there has been no lack of visitors. On Friday last week the shooting went steadily on, the Alexandra Prizes and the Battalion Sweepstakes being the principal competitions. On Saturday, when the Chinese Ambassadors visited the camp, The Graphic Prizes, the Chinese Challenge Vase, the Belgian Challenge Cup, and the National Challenge Trophy were shot for, the latter being substituted for the International Challenge Trophy, which the canny Scots, having once carried across the Border, will not suffer to be again brought south of the Tweed. It was carried off by the English team, who obtained an easy victory over the Irish. On Sunday there was the usual Church Service in the umbrella tent, conducted by the Rev. H. Villiers, rector of Addisham; a Presbyterian service, at which the Rev. Mr. Kirkwood officiated, was also held. In the afternoon, though heavy thunder-showers fell at intervals, thousands of visitors thronged into the lines. On Monday the chief item in the programme was the Albert Prize, the Lords' and Commons' Match being adjourned on account of the weather. Tuesday saw the victory of Private Jamieson, of the 15th Lancashire Rifles, who won the Queen's Prize by one point, and is stated by a contemporary to have dreamt on the previous night of having done so. On Wednesday the Regulars and Volunteers did battle for the Donegal Challenge Cup, the amateur soldiers beating the professionals. The second stage of the Albert Prize was also shot off. On Thursday the Public Schools' Match, the Lords and Commons competition, and the contest for the Elcho Shield were to come off.

STORMS AND FLOODS.——Violent gales, heavy rain, and high tides have been prevalent in many parts of the country during the past week, and much damage to property is reported. The crops have suffered greatly, and the hay crop especially has been spoilt. At Oldham two boys who were playing in a culvert were drowned by a sudden rush of water from the upper part of the town, their bodies being carried upwards of a mile and almost knocked to pieces. Part of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway between Wigan and Southport has been washed away. Several mills and manufactories have been flooded, and work stopped, and a large number of workpeople thrown idle. At Warrington the North Western Railway was flooded on Sunday to the depth of several feet, and some of the engine fires were extinguished. At Dunball, near Bridgewater, a new main drainage "cut" just completed at a cost of over 4,000*l.* on Monday suddenly collapsed with a loud report, carrying with it a large part of the turnpike road, and undermining a bridge and several houses. The road traffic is diverted for more than four miles. On Saturday the parade ground of the Camborne Volunteer Corps suddenly gave way, leaving a chasm 150 yards in width by 600 feet in depth. It appears that the ground formed the "crown" of a long-forgotten mine, and that the surface earth had become rotten by the action of repeated rains. The corps had a narrow escape, for immediately before the occurrence a full parade had been held on the ground.

LONDON MORTALITY continues to increase slightly, and 1,449 deaths were registered last week, against 1,322 during the previous seven days, an increase of 117, but being 27 below the average, and at the rate of 21·4 per 1,000. Deaths from small-pox numbered 32 (an increase of 9), from measles 28 (a decline of 16), from scarlet fever 21, from diphtheria 7, from whooping-cough 46 (an increase of 11), from different forms of fever 21 (14 below the average), and from diarrhœa 169 (an increase of 73, but being 21 below the average), 134 were infants under one year of age, and 27 of children between one and two. Different forms of violence caused 60 deaths, 52 were the result of negligence or accident. There were 2,310 births registered, against 2,220 during the previous week. The registered duration of sunshine during the week was 40·5 hours out of the 113·6 hours that the sun was above the horizon. The mean temperature was 61·2 deg., or 1·2 deg. below the average.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Commission of Inquiry into the condition of Christ's Hospital has commenced its labours, and much disappointment has been caused by its having done so with closed doors. It is hard to say why this should be, as the evidence must be published sooner or later, and we should certainly have thought better sooner than later. Meanwhile the public, though denied legitimate information, is at liberty to sup full of horrors related by "Old Blues" and others, whose experiences of school-life do not seem to have been of a very enviable character. Of course there are two sides to this as to every other question, so we have also a series of letters from other Old Blues, who picture Christ's Hospital as a kind of earthly Paradise.—An unfortunate quarrel has arisen over the distribution of the Fund collected in the City for the Welsh miners of Pontypridd. It seems that Mr. James Thomas and some other gentlemen, owners, agents, and engineers of the colliery, object to the list of candidates sent by the Rev. D. W. Williams, and demand that their own list shall be acted upon instead, otherwise they will accept no award. The Lord Mayor, however, declines to adopt the suggestion, and it remains to be seen what will become of the valuable presents which the discontented gentlemen have refused.—A Domestic Economy Congress is now in progress at Birmingham, under the auspices of the Society of Arts. It opened on Tuesday with a conversazione and exhibition of household necessaries, and amongst the speakers whose names have been announced are Mrs. Gladstone, the Countess of Ebersburg, Miss Helen Taylor, Professor Huxley, and Captain Galton.—Lord Shaftesbury took the chair at a meeting which was held at Willis's Rooms, on Monday, in aid of the distressed refugees from Bosnia and Herzegovina. He gave an account of Miss Irby's visit to the mountains, and said that she had received 15,000*l.*, all of which had been expended excepting 2,000*l.*, which was necessary for the support of twenty schools. Among the other speakers were Mr. W. E. Forster, Sir R. Phillimore, Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. Forsyth, and Mr. Gladstone, and resolutions were passed expressing sympathy with the refugees and admiration and gratitude for the work done by Miss Irby and Miss Johnson on their behalf.—The people of Manchester do not appear to appreciate the educational advantages of its Aquarium. The building is to be closed and the company wound up.—Fleet Street is "up," vehicular traffic has been stopped for more than a week, and how long it is to continue so it would be hard to say. The paviours not only monopolise the whole road, but part of the footways also, and pedestrians have to keep a sharp look-out to avoid being jostled by the men who go to and fro bearing buckets of boiling asphalte, the smoke from which has a blinding and suffocating effect. Why cannot the work be hastened by employing more men, and working by night as well as by day?

PARLIAMENT

The position of affairs in the House of Commons is indicated by the fact that within the space of time ordinarily treated in this review there have been two "counts-out." The Session has been rather barren of this not unwelcome fruit, the earlier portion being remarkable for the success with which occasional attempts to count out were resisted. Lately, however, they have increased in a considerable degree. This is a matter which it is not difficult to account for. The Government have now, by an ingenious device which has been one of Mr. Disraeli's greatest Parliamentary successes, appropriated the time of private members, while affecting to leave them in the position they formerly occupied. Tuesdays and Fridays now being taken for morning sittings, the Government get their work done before seven o'clock, and at nine private members must look after themselves.

In the earlier stages of morning sittings the perils of private members are not so great, because—more particularly on a Friday—Supply is put down as the first Government order, and a sanguine Secretary always hopes against hope that he may, somewhere about midnight, come in and get a few votes. Mr. Biggar and Mr. Parnell have been instrumental in changing that to the extent that it is now well-known that obstruction will be placed in the way of doing any Government work after midnight. Thus the Government have practically abandoned the hope of doing work on nights following morning sittings, and it might be written under the current date in "Zadkiel's Parliamentary Almanack" (if there were such a thing), "Counts-out now occur frequently."

On Friday night the count-out occurred on a motion by Mr. J. W. Barclay, who had a motion on a Scotch subject. Under no circumstances is Mr. Barclay an attractive speaker, and the prospect of hearing a monologue of an hour's duration from him was not sufficient to bring members down at nine o'clock on the last day of a week throughout which long sittings had prevailed. There had been some understanding between Mr. Barclay and the Irish members, that in the event of his moderately curtailing his speech, they, who were interested in the sitting to the extent that Mr. Butt had a motion on the paper, would make a House. Somehow or other this compact failed, and Mr. Barclay, whilst the delight of hearing his own voice was still fresh, was cruelly counted out. On Tuesday the case was more serious. Mr. Russell Gurney had fixed this night for bringing forward his motion relating to the Turkish Loan of 1854. The subject was one interesting to a large class throughout the country, and was not without its political importance. The Recorder of London had devoted a considerable portion of his valuable time to getting up the facts and preparing his speech; but just as he rose, and before he had spoken a word, Mr. Callan called the Speaker's attention to the scarcity of members present, and on counting it was discovered that there were not the necessary 40. Thus, Mr. Russell Gurney's speech was nipped even before it had reached the bud stage, and the Ministerial statement which it was whispered the Chancellor of the Exchequer had prepared was also relegated to the limbo of unspoken speeches. Why Mr. Callan should have counted the House is one of those mysteries explicable only to the hon. gentleman's natural desire of making himself as disagreeable as possible. Mr. Osborne Morgan, it is said, looks upon this incident as a judgment upon the Recorder of London, who, having had an opportunity pressed upon him of standing aside so that the Burials Bill might be discussed, refused the offer, with the result recorded above.

On Monday the Government had the monotony of official life varied by a distinct defeat. The agent in this phenomenon was Mr. John Holms, the member for Hackney, who has taken up with some vigour and final success the curious appointment made by Lord Beaconsfield to the Controllership of the Stationery Office. This appointment had been held by Mr. Greg, who under the initials "W. R. G." has for many years used up a good deal of the commodity with which he was officially connected in writing for the newspapers and the quarterly journals. It seems that Mr. Greg when he was appointed knew very little about the practical duties of his office, and that Mr. Pigott knew at least as much. The difference between the two cases is that "W. R. G." was appointed a good many years ago, before Parliament had assumed its active inquisitorial character. Moreover, in the mean time a Select Committee has sat to consider the very question involved, and the Committee reported strongly against the appointment to this class of office of men who know nothing of the business which they are called upon to control. Probably Lord Beaconsfield forgot all about this. Peradventure he never read the report of the Select Committee. Possibly he did not care very much about it. However it be, upon the resignation of Mr. Greg he appointed to the office Mr. Pigott, whose chief qualification appears to be that he was the son of a gentleman who has for many years been Vicar of Hughenden.

The appointment seemed natural enough till it was called attention to, when such men as the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. W. H. Smith found themselves especially unqualified for defending it. Mr. W. H. Smith has special means of knowing how necessary is knowledge in this Department, whilst the Chancellor of the Exchequer's predominant business qualities and his strong common sense served to make him a poor defender of his chief's vagary. Mr. Gathorne Hardy, who on Monday was put up to strengthen the defence, was more emphatic, but not more successful, and amid rapturous cheering from the Opposition, to whom successes like this come very rarely, Mr. Holms' vote of censure on the Prime Minister was carried by a majority of four.

For the rest, the House has been kept steadily at work on the estimates, and Messrs. Biggar and Parnell being in a comparatively gracious mood, considerable progress has been made. On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Sullivan attempted a coup d'état by introducing a Bill which, failing the closing of public-houses in Ireland on Sundays, would close them at seven o'clock on Saturday evenings. The humour of the thing was, however, not to be prolonged throughout the debate, which proved rather dreary, and in the end the Bill was disposed of by a counter coup d'état. Towards five o'clock Mr. Sullivan left the House for a few minutes, observing which his compatriots suddenly stopped the debate, and the question being put, and no one being authorised to challenge the Speaker's decision, the Bill was declared negatived without a division.

SPORTING

The Turf.——A quiet week's racing has succeeded Liverpool, where the defeat of Petrarch by Snail was one of the sensations of the season. In a field of twelve odds were laid on Petrarch, who was leading, and appeared to be winning in a canter some four strides or so from the chair, when he stumbled, or did something or other, which enabled Lord Rosebery's horse to win by a head. There are some, however, who think that Lord Lonsdale's grand animal showed the "white feather" when the finish came. If he did it was not the first time in his career. But if all good things were brought off where would the poor bookmakers be? When, however, we say the past week has been a quiet one, it must not be supposed that the Sandown Park Second Summer Meeting was a minor affair, for the very contrary was the case, good fields and good racing ruling on both days, and the presence of the Prince of Wales infusing additional spirit into the proceedings. Nearly all of the ten starters were backed for the Surbiton Handicap, a compliment to the handicapper, and Tribute, who with Lady Atholstone and Strathavon shared the favouriteship at 4 to 1 each, secured the prize. The Great Kingston Two-Year-Old Stakes attracted thirteen to the post, and resulted in Lady Palmer II. beating Ambuscade by a neck. The latter, however, atoned for the defeat by winning the Warren Nursery Stakes on the Wednesday. On the same day King Death, who seems rather an unlucky horse, won the Members' Welter, and in the Royal Stakes Azov landed a 6 to 1 chance for Captain Bayley. Mr. C. Bush, who seems to be gradually becoming formidable as an owner, took the Surrey Juvenile Stakes with Brown Saxon, though Sister Louise started with evens on her; and Killiecrankie added another to his recent victories by securing the Handicap Plate, which brought the meeting to a conclusion.

Horses trained in Berkshire and adjoining districts of course figured conspicuously at the Lambourne meeting, and the Alexandra Park gathering was, as usual, Alexandra Parky.

The Goodwood Stakes continue to attract unusual attention, Lord Hartington's Rylstone being favourite at the time of penning these notes, with Prince George in close attendance, Hampton being "quiet." There seems, however, every reasonable prospect of the latter seeing the post, and with all his weight may not unlikely start first favourite. If so he will probably win.

Silvio and Chamant are about equal favourites for the St. Leger, the French horse Fontainebleau being next in demand, and likely to meet a much shorter price than 8 to 1.

Cricket.——The ball has kept rolling pretty merrily since our last, notwithstanding the rain which has accompanied the festival of St. Swithin.—The Eton and Harrow Match at Lord's on the Friday and Saturday of last week presented the now well-recognised aspect of a gigantic aristocratic pic-nic. The play was very fair for "boys" all round, and the closeness of the first innings on each side—Harrow 157, and Eton 163—gave promise of a very interesting game. The Harrow team made 193 in their second attempt; but, owing to unforeseen cessations of the game from the rain, Eton could not complete their batting, and so the game had to be drawn. The Light Blues, however, got 78 with the loss of only one wicket, leaving them 110 to get with the nine remaining. It may therefore fairly be said that the draw was in their favour.—At Huddersfield, Lancashire has beaten Yorkshire by nine wickets, Mr. Appleby's 69 for the former being the highest score in the game, Greenwood for Yorkshire being next with 41.—Surrey has made a capital fight with Notts, being beaten by only 18 runs. A remarkable feature in this match was that 150 was the sum total of the highest of the four innings; and, as in the Lancashire and Yorkshire Match, there was no individual sensational score as is so common in first-class matches nowadays.—Among minor matches it may be noted that Westminster has beaten Charterhouse on the first innings of a day's match.

Aquatics.——The Amateur Sculling Championship of the Thames has been retained by Mr. F. Playford, of the London Rowing Club, who has beaten Mr. Edwardes-Moss, of Brasenose College, Oxford, the recent winner of the Diamond Sculls at Henley. The race, which came off on Monday last, was, as usual, over the Championship Course, from Putney to Mortlake, and as far as Hammersmith Bridge was a very fine one, both men showing first-class form, and with little to choose between them. After this crucial point, however, Mr. Playford had it all his own way, winning "anyhow." Mr. Playford, who is a "chip of the old block," and indeed something more, though only twenty-two years of age, is perhaps the best amateur sculler seen on the Thames for many years; and unless some new light of extraordinary brilliancy unexpectedly shines forth it does not seem likely that he will lose his proud position for many seasons to come.

Pedestrianism.——There really seem to be no limits to what our pedestrians can do. They continue to "eclipse themselves," and to use the words of the Laureate it is probable that "that which they have done" is "but earnest of the things that they shall do." Let us note then that in a three hours' walking match between Perkins and Howes at Lillie Bridge on Monday last, the former walked in the time specified 22 miles 190 yards, a feat that has never been performed before.

Quoits, like many other old games and pastimes, is experiencing a revival. And the game deserves it, for it is a good and a "classic" one. The first of three games for 200*l*. and the championship has been played in London between those well-known hands Graham and Hadnow, resulting in the victory of the latter; but the two games to be played at Glasgow may yet turn the table.—The "swells" are taking up the game, and aristocratic clubs are increasing and multiplying.—On Saturday last twenty-five gentlemen of Cheshire antagonised twenty-five of Lancashire, the game being played in two divisions, one at Liverpool, and the other at Manchester. Lancashire got the best of it.

A Monument to the composer of the "Wacht-am-Rhein"—Carl Wilhelm—is to be inaugurated at Crefeld on September 2.

A Fine-Art Exhibition will be opened at Simla on Sept. 28th. The prizes will be open to amateurs, and the Viceroy gives a prize for the best water-colour on an Indian subject.

The Ceylon Section of the proposed Colonial and Indian Museum on the Thames Embankment will be largely supported by the Ceylon Legislative Council, which has promised 15,000*l*. in three annual payments towards the erection of the building.

A Newspaper for the Blind is to be brought out at Geneva in January. The publisher is also the inventor of an ingenious writing machine enabling the blind to form characters perfectly legible to ordinary persons, but raised so as to be deciphered by blind people.

The Fabulous Unicorn, like the sea serpent, seems likely to prove to be a reality. A wonderful discovery has been made near Hurdwar, in North-West India, where a party of European sportsmen met with an animal exactly resembling the one-horned companion of our British lion. Unfortunately the creature escaped.

The Rise in the Value of Old Books within the last five-and-twenty years was well illustrated on Monday by the sale of Earl Coningsby's "Collections Concerning the Manor of Marden," a small folio volume privately printed in 1722. The same copy was sold in 1851 for 12*l*., whilst on the present occasion it realised 340*l*.

The Shah of Persia has presented to the South Kensington Museum an assortment of modern Persian textile manufactures, consisting of carpets and various kinds of embroidery. The gift was accompanied by a letter expressing His Majesty's desire that the gift should be accepted as a souvenir, and as an acknowledgment of the friendly manner in which Persian art has been regarded in England.

A Race between a Carrier Pigeon and a Continental Express Train from Dover to London took place on Saturday, the pigeon being the winner. The distance is 76½ miles by rail, and 70 miles "as the crow flies," and the pigeon reached home twenty minutes before the train arrived at Cannon Street, beating by a time allowance representing 18 miles. The bird was a homing pigeon of the "Belgian Voyageur" breed.

Gold in India.——The Chief Commissioner of Assam has been asking for information about the auriferous rivers of his province. Years ago there was a good deal of gold washing done there; about 8,000*l*. or 10,000*l*. a year was made, but now larger profits are found in the tea plantations. The Assamese, however, as might be imagined, had only rough ways of collecting their gold dust, and with modern appliances this source of wealth might be again developed.

A Catalogue of the Artistic Treasures of France has been in preparation for three years, under Government direction, and the first instalment has now appeared. Not only are important historical monuments to be indicated, but even the minutest object in every private and public collection and in the most obscure village will be carefully described. The present volume is devoted to ecclesiastical art in Paris, and two volumes will be brought out every year until the work is completed.

The Divisibility of Gold into the minutest possible fibres has been tried by an American assayist with great success, the American Architect tells us. Some thin films of gold, which were obtained by electric deposition upon copper and afterwards detached, were shown to the Franklin Institute, these pieces of gold-leaf being perfectly transparent and transmitting a green hue. The films were so thin that one grain of the metal would cover nearly four square feet. This is ten thousand times thinner than ordinary writing paper, and 2,798,000 of such films together would be required to make an inch.

Country School for Poor London Children.——A house (with orchard, garden, &c.) has been taken by Mr. William Rossiter, at Halstead, near Sevenoaks, where it is proposed to try, on a small scale, the experiment of a country school, to which poor London children can be sent for a few weeks at a time. It is intended that the children shall keep the garden in order, cultivate small kitchen-gardens, and make collection of plants and other natural objects. The only ordinary schoolwork of reading and writing will be giving descriptions of such collections, and using a small library of reference which will be kept for that purpose; as it is hoped the school will be a real Kindergarten in which the teaching will be entirely by objects and by personal intercourse between teachers and scholars.

A Day in the Country.——An appeal for the annual holiday to a large number of children attending the London Cottage Mission, Limehouse, and Shadwell Sunday Schools, is made by the Hon. Director, Mr. W. Austin, 48, Finsbury Circus, E.C., who will receive contributions in company with the Hon. Secretaries, Miss Napton, 304, Burdett Road, E., and Miss Stewart, 63, New Finchley Road, Hampstead, N.—A similar request comes from the Bell Alley Mission and Ragged Schools, 6, Bell Alley, Goswell Road, E.C., where the Superintendent, Mr. J. Salmon, asks for donations of money, food, and clothing towards giving the Ragged School children and a few adults attending the Mission a day's fresh air. Contributions to be sent to the above address.

The Excavation of Cleopatra's Needle is going on most satisfactorily, and the obelisk has been cleaned, and proves to be in a better state of preservation than had been supposed. It has been conveyed down to the edge of the water, where it is being enclosed in the cylindrical iron vessel, the Cleopatra, which is to bring the Needle to England; and Mr. Dixon writes to the Daily Telegraph that he will start in a fortnight or three weeks to witness the launch. As regards the site of the obelisk, Mr. Dixon and Professor Erasmus Wilson have the final choice. Mr. Dixon objects to the suggestion of placing it either in front of the British Museum or at the end of Northumberland Avenue, and considers the best position would be at the Whitehall Steps, midway between Charing Cross and Westminster Bridges. Here the obelisk would be seen well from the river, would stand clear of the footpath, and would be visible from Westminster Bridge and along the whole line of the Embankment, while it would form an appropriate centre to the group of English statesmen in New Palace Yard. The obelisk would be landed to the west of the Victoria Tower, and would be brought to Whitehall Steps through Abingdon Street, so as to avoid all interference with the traffic and the danger of moving so heavy a weight through undermined London streets.

MUSSEL-CULTURE IN FRANCE—GATHERING THE MUSSELS AT THE MOUTH OF THE SOMME, NEAR ST. VALÉRY

SOME ECCLESIOLOGICAL DISCOVERIES AND REMAINS IN LONDON

WE have so frequently to record the destruction of ancient buildings in the metropolis, that it is with feelings of pleasure that we are able to call the attention of our readers to some interesting discoveries of ecclesiastical antiquities, and to the means taken for preserving several valuable examples of mediæval architecture. Our first sketch (No. 1), represents the remains of a singularly beautiful reredos (or altar-piece) recently discovered at Westminster Abbey upon removing the upper portion of the monument of the Duchess of Somerset. This fine fragment is situated in the centre bay of the eastern aisle of the north transept, and was the altar of a chapel dedicated to St. Michael. It originally consisted of seven remarkably fine niches, but of these only three and a half have been left; the others were totally destroyed when the monument of Lady Nightingale was erected. This reredos probably dates from about the time of Henry VI., and it bears traces of colour and gilding. In front of this reredos is a large slab of Purbeck marble, which was found near the spot, and it is presumed that it formed the slab of the altar; it is nearly nine feet long, and about three wide.

Our sketch (2) represents the monument of Sir John de Oteswich and Mary his wife, temp. Henry IV. This monument originally stood in the church of St. Martin Outwich, in Bishopsgate Street, which was pulled down about two years since. It has been re-erected in St. Helen's Church, Bishopsgate, at the expense of the Merchant Taylors' Company. In preparing the side chapel of the church for its reception, the remains of an ancient altar and reredos were discovered; these are shown in our sketch.

Our sketch (3) represents the beautiful monument of Hugh Pemberton, which like the former was removed from the destroyed church of St. Martin Outwich, and rebuilt in St. Helen's. It is a very elegant example of Gothic architecture of the time of Henry VII., and is constructed entirely of Purbeck marble. The following inscription is to be read round the ledge of the tomb: "Hugo Pemberton, aldermanus ejusdem civitatis, et Katerina ejus uxor. Quī quidē Hugo obiit die mensis Septembris, Anno Dn̄i millesimo Vc—(1500) quoum animabus propicietur Deus."

Our sketch (4) represents the magnificent western window of Ely Chapel, which has recently been brought to light by the removal of two huge galleries and a coating of brick and plaster. It is a noble specimen of the very best period of Gothic architecture at the commencement of the fourteenth century, and is exceedingly richly moulded. The restoration of this chapel is progressing, the ancient roof, which was formerly concealed from view by a plaster ceiling, has been brought to light and carefully restored. It is to be hoped that the possessors of this remarkably beautiful chapel will not attempt to restore it too much. The fine wall arcade between the windows, for instance, certainly should be left in its present condition, for as the whole of the lower portions of it have been destroyed, it would be a great mistake to attempt to replace them by modern work, which would be simply converting what is now a singularly beautiful fragment into a valueless and unmeaning piece of patchwork. Should the authorities at Ely Chapel be over-burthened with money they might cover the lower part of the walls with rich oak panelling, but we most earnestly plead that the beautiful wall-arcade may be spared from any attempts at restoration. Our last sketch (5) represents the curious crypt of Ely Chapel, which has been reopened as a Roman Catholic chapel. It is singularly picturesque, and more Continental-looking than anything in London. We are glad to see that nothing has been done to deprive this portion of the building of its venerable appearance, and its somewhat grotto-like look adds greatly to the devotional and mysterious aspect of the place. The new stone columns supporting the vast ancient roof look very raw at present, but probably a few years of London dirt will reduce them to a more agreeable colour. We may just hint that some valuable examples of ancient work, including a curious stone bowl, deserve a better fate than to be converted into a kind of "rockery" in the priests' garden; they should if possible be replaced in the chapel, or at any rate placed where they will be taken care of, and protected from the weather. Some curious fragments of stained glass have likewise been discovered; these, we understand, are to be carefully preserved and replaced in one of the windows of the upper chapel.

A PREHISTORIC CITY IN TUSCANY

GREAT interest has been excited in Italy by the discovery which has been made this summer by two of our countrymen, Mr. Heath Wilson and Mr. Pullan, of the remains of a vast prehistoric city in the dense forest which covers the flanks of the Monte Leone in the Maremma.

The accompanying sketches of Monte Leone and the scenery around have been kindly sent us by Mr. Heath Wilson. They were made by him as long ago as 1831, whilst he was inspecting the remains of several Etruscan cities in the neighbourhood which have since become well known. At this time neither he nor any one else seems to have suspected the existence of such a city, for its gigantic walls were only lighted on now and then by adventurous sportsmen who hunted the wild boar on the mountain, and who took no note of such purely archæological matters. But Mr. Heath Wilson, from information since received from Count Bossi regarding these walls, was led to believe that he had missed some remains of considerable interest during his exploration in 1831. He naturally felt very desirous of continuing his researches; but, his health not now permitting of his making such a fatiguing journey himself, his friend Mr. Pullan, the distinguished archæologist, undertook to make the necessary survey, assisted most courteously by the Count Bossi and the Count Salviati, the owners of the territory, who kindly provided guides, horses, and other requirements.

Mr. Pullan's account of what he met with during his ten hours' ride over Monte Leone through paths only known to the gamekeepers, and through brushwood and heath twenty feet high, was published in the Academy of June 16. He found that the walls he had come to inspect were rudely built of huge boulders piled one on the other without much attempt to fit them together; that in some places they rose to a height of twenty feet, and were also about twenty feet in thickness, and that altogether they enclosed a circuit of fifteen miles. Besides this encircling wall he observed on one spur of the mountain a great outwork of semi-circular form, the chord of which was a mile in length, and outside this another wall of six feet in thickness, evidently a second line of defence.

At first Mr. Pullan imagined that these walls might have been the defences of a camp of Gauls, who were defeated near this spot in 223 B.C. But their enormous extent and thickness soon precluded this idea. It became indeed certain as his survey continued that here must have been the site of an ancient and warlike city as large as Rome now is, and surrounded probably by enemies, or else why such enormously strong defences?

But what could this city have been, and who were the race that inhabited it? It has been suggested that here might be found the long-lost Vetulonia of the Etruscans, but these rude walls are not of Etruscan build. Mr. Pullan surmises in a letter to the Academy of July 7 that, although certainly not the Vetulonia of the Etruscans, the city on Monte Leone may be the Vetulonia described by Alberti as situated in a wood, and with walls of great extent. But even if this should be so, we come no nearer to the origin of this mysterious city.

Researches, however, are to be continued, and a society will probably be formed in order to raise funds for making a more extended survey, and, if desirable, excavations, so that it is to be hoped that before long modern science may throw some light on this interesting subject.

MUSSEL CULTURE IN FRANCE

PUBLIC attention has been steadily fixed upon every fresh improvement introduced in pisciculture from the date of the early experiments carried out at Huningue for fresh-water fish, and at various French ports under Mr. Coste for sea-fish. Advantage has been duly taken of the various results attained, principally in re-stocking rivers, and in multiplying and bettering oysters. In this matter a novel step has within the last two years been taken with considerable success in France, though it applies to what is still regarded in most English households as coarse food, yet keeps a very fair position upon every French table; it well deserves notice and imitation wherever tidal rivers, sluggish estuaries, sheltered creeks, and low foreshores can admit of it.

This new branch of pisciculture is the artificial breeding, rearing, and fattening of mussels; and the site selected for developing the natural produce into a fair rival of the oyster is at the mouth of the Somme, just below the pretty township of St. Valery, close to the outlet of the splendid ship canal connecting it with Abbeville.

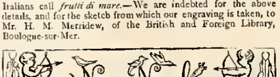
The process can be summarised into three stages, as it is carried on there by M. Lemaire, of Cap Hornu.

Just off the bend of the towing embankment, rows of wattled stakes, which might be mistaken for lines of sheep hurdles stuck close to low water mark, serve for intercepting the spat and germs of the wild mussels, which, after having been washed away from natural beds lying miles off along the sea-coast at Hourdel and elsewhere, are carried about by the tidal current; to the twigs of the wattling these stick and fasten, and then grow until picked off when they have reached a certain size. During this first probationary stage upon les bouchots de grand flôt, they live on conditions nearly identical with those on the foreshore scorps or beds.

Thence they are removed to large, wide, deep tanks, likewise set with parallel rows of wattled stakes, and lying close to high-water mark. These pits, two in number, and averaging fifteen acres, les bacs d'élevage, are designed with a view to hastening the maturity of the mussels deposited in them by means of water which, from its sheltered position at the foot of wooded heights, keeps warmer than the tidal stream, from its admixture with the canal outpour becomes noticeably softened, and from the variety of animal and vegetable matter carried by the Somme, supplies rich and abundant food. The spawning follows in its due seasons, and the spat thus thrown off finds a fitting receptacle and shelter in a broad-tangled belt of small twigs and fine branches set round the four sides of each bac d'élevage.

After attaining in these breeding pits proper size for removal, the young mussels are thrown into a large pool some forty-two acres in area, some seventeen or eighteen feet deep, which is also planted with numerous rows of stakes and wattles. This is called le parc. From causes similar to those which obtain in the bacs d'élevage—namely, a higher temperature, softer water, and plentiful feed—they soon attain in this fattening tank qualities of size, plumpness, juiciness, colour, and flavour not far inferior, if at all, to those with which the tough, rough, leathery wild oyster has been endowed by proper cultivation.

When ready for market, they are gathered off the rows of wattled stakes in a very picturesque, original fashion. The water being drained off with opened sluices, a shallow, narrow boat, made of four boards, and called le poussepied, from the mode of propulsion used, is carried down the sloping edge of the pit and laid on its broad keel; the mussel-gatherer sets one knee upon the bottom board, keeps his other leg over the side, and thus, astraddle on the gunwale, pushes the boat forward with kicks of his booted foot thrust down into the mud. With his two disengaged hands he navigates between the espalier-like rows of stakes like a vintager between rows of vines, picking bunches and clusters of mussels which thus very fairly represent what the Italians call frutti di mare.—We are indebted for the above details, and for the sketch from which our engraving is taken, to Mr. H. M. Merridew, of the British and Foreign Library, Boulogne-sur-Mer.



New Novels

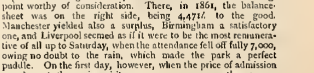
"FOOTPRINTS IN THE SNOW," by Dora Russell, author of "The Vicar's Governess," &c. (3 vols.: Tinsley).—This is very much the best story we have had from Miss Russell since "The Vicar's Governess," and is indeed quite as good as that work, supposing it to have lacked the one character of the Vicar himself. Perhaps the situation out of which the plot is developed is somewhat more remarkable for boldness of conception than probability. It seems, to say the least of it, a farfetched and circuitous method of winning a woman for wife for a man to shoot the one of two brothers she does not love from behind a hedge, persuade her through the footprints left by the murderer in the snow that the crime had been committed by the other of them whom she does love, and then force her into matrimony by the threat of otherwise hanging her lover. A little reflection, one would have thought, would have convinced a person of Elizabeth Gordon's mental sanity that it was a great deal more likely that some other person had somehow become possessed of Lieutenant Jasper Tyrrell's boots and handkerchief than that he without assignable cause or object should have become suddenly transformed into a cowardly assassin, whose victim was his own brother. However, as this natural explanation of the mystery does not occur to Elizabeth, she is forced, as every appeal for mercy and release is vain, to pay the price demanded for secrecy, and become the unloving wife of the real murderer, her cousin, Richard Horton, justly described as a "sullen and selfish cub." Her farther fortunes, which we will not reveal, are sketched for us with much ingenuity and spirit, and form a tale, the interest of which hardly ever flags, and which is well worthy of the attention of all novel-readers. Sir John Tyrell, with his exquisite polish and courtesy of manner, his high sense of justice, and his kindly cynicism, is an excellent character, on whom the author may be sincerely congratulated, and Dean Dalziel and his brother, the Major, might, perhaps, have been nearly as good if as much pains had been taken with them. The contempt which each feels for the other's tastes and pursuits—a feeling, as we all know, so common among members of the same family as they grow advanced in years,—is very amusingly brought out in the cases of this worldly and ambitious churchman and stay-at-home, easy-going man of war. Eva Dalziel, too, in her fresh and innocent girlishness, makes an effective foil to the more mature and deeper-natured Elizabeth. Miss Russell's story might, perhaps, have gained by compression, not so much in the way of text as of commentary, but it is entitled to stand well in the fiction of the year, and with the signs of revived power she here displays we do not believe that we have even yet had from her by any means the best she may have it in her to give.

"Blue Roses; or, Helen Malinofska's Marriage," by the author of "Vera," &c. (2 vols.: H. S. King and Co.).—"Blue Roses," according to a phrase of Alphonse Karr's, which the author places on her title-page, are the roses which we may dream of, whose perfume we may even seem to breathe, but which we never gather. They stand for "ungrasped ideals, illusory hopes, golden dreams," aspirations after a happiness impossible in itself, or at least impossible to us. The tale of the quest after a "Blue Rose," resulting in a life spoiled and wasted, and only soothed into calm and harmony at its close, which we have in these pages, is very sad, but of very delicate and touching beauty. Princess Helen Malinofska, a young Polish lady of high rank, and the very "embodiment of youth, mirth, and beauty," falls passionately in love with Captain Francis Baldwin, an English officer in the Austrian service, and the heir to an ancient but impoverished baronetcy. There are difficulties in the way of the marriage of the pair; but Helen's mother and brother waive their objections in their desire to have her at any rate spared from the troubles they foresee coming upon their unhappy country (the period, it may be said, is shortly before the insurrection of 1863); and Helen departs with her "Franz" to England, loving him with all the passion and devotion of her ardent nature, exalting him into an ideal hero, and convinced that no cloud will ever darken her sky. Perfect happiness is the "Blue Rose" she seeks; nothing short of this will content her, little fitted as is one at once so wilful and so sensitive as she is to attain it at all, and impossible of attainment as it is to her as the wife of such a man as Francis Baldwin. But we cannot pause here to tell how Helen sees her rose wither and her dream dissolve; and realising at last that she has lost her husband's love, and with it lost all motive for living, passes out of the world with a broken heart. The pathos of the tale is deep and true, and in every detail of her work the writer shows herself the artist. The picture of the sufferings, patience, and heroism of the Polish refugees in Paris during and after the insurrection seems painted from the life, and is one of rare and high excellence. The book is almost too melancholy to allow us to say that it is a pleasant one, but no readers of culture can refuse it the tribute of sincere admiration.

"Love's Young Dream," by F. E. M. Notley, author of "Olive Varcoe," &c. (3 vols.: Tinsley).—On the title-page this story appears as "Love's Young Dream," but throughout the body of the work the title is "Love Has Eyes." We confess we fail to see the suitability of either the one title or the other, but this is not of much consequence. There is no want of incident of a startling and sensational kind in the story; it can boast a villain who is as hateful and unredeemed a specimen of his class as any one can desire; and some of the scenes, notably in the third volume, show some real power in working up "telling" situations. At the same time we must own to having often found it very tiresome, and we fancy that readers who are not content to put up with mere sensationalism, more or less effective, will be inclined to agree with us.

"Adam and Eve's Courtship; or, How to Write a Novel," by Jay Wye (Samuel Tinsley).—People who may not happen to come across this novel need not be apprehensive that they have thereby missed a pleasure. "Jay Wye" thinks it possible that ill-natured critics may even find fault with his grammar. With such sentences before us as "When gentlemen commence chess us poor ladies are entirely forgotten," and "Dear me! how carefully one ought to confine oneself to their subject," we should think this very probable.

"Love the Leveller," by Angus Comyn (Samuel Tinsley) is described as "a tale of the Great Rebellion." Its style abounds in the "fair comrade," "marry, wench," and other expressions suitable to the period, and we do not know that it is altogether a bad story in its way, though a little, or it may be more than a little, heavy.



RURAL NOTES

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.——This society has been "educating its party" at very considerable expense for a long series of years. Leeds was the first turning-point worthy of consideration. There, in 1861, the balance-sheet was on the right side, being 4,471*l.* to the good. Manchester yielded also a surplus, Birmingham a satisfactory one, and Liverpool seemed as if it were to be the most remunerative of all up to Saturday, when the attendance fell off fully 7,000, owing no doubt to the rain, which made the park a perfect puddle. On the first day, however, when the price of admission was dearest, the paying visitors were more numerous than on any previous occasion. In this column it would be superfluous to say that the treat given by the local committee to all the members to visit the public buildings and docks was thoroughly enjoyed, most of them having been previously prepared for the scenes by the illustrations in The Graphic. Nearly 140,000 people were registered at the turnstiles at Newsham Park, so that Birmingham and Liverpool, it may be said, run neck and neck as to numbers. So far as the merits of stock in the show are concerned, there was little difference save in the case of pigs, which were altogether inferior. Prize-taking shorthorns, the breed upon which we most rely for our beef, were identical with those of Birmingham. Sir Arthur Ingram, Mr. Linton's bull, was first in his class and the Cup as the first shorthorn male. He was only second at Birmingham, where he was beaten by the Marquis of Exeter's Telemachus, who stood second at Liverpool. These two animals have been chopped and changed about for the last three years. Sir Arthur gained the Havering Park Prize Cup of 100 guineas at the Essex Show at Chelmsford. Royal and cart-horses better. Milking cows, Jersey and Ayrshire, those that supply our milk, were of a mixed character. There were no surpassingly good Ayrshires; and those in the dairy class were mixed up with animals by no means of the same character, whose udders and thick shoulders showed that they were meant for beef rather than milk.

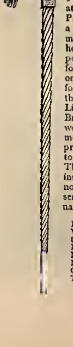
THE WEATHER.——St. Swithin this season appears to be in a very irritable temper. He has evidently got up on "the wrong side of the blanket." Although it was the Sabbath, and he was a saint, he commenced pouring down on Sunday most unmercifully raindrops as big as florins, with hailstones commingled, and has been continuing in "our next," greatly to the detriment of hay-makers who have not yet got all their hay in. Between Liverpool and London there is still a considerable portion to cut, and in the fields much lying to be put into cocks. The wheat must suffer from the violent blasts, and so the other cereals, because the rain has been accompanied with cold wind. The roots on heavy lands will not improve, and on light lands suffer from the showers that come down so sternly without accompanying sunshine. The stock looks fairly as they graze on the pastures, so far as can be judged in passing by on the train, and as they appear in the market. Sunshine, with little shade, is at the present time the farmer's only prayer.

THE COLORADO BEETLE.——About this creature something was said in last "Rural Notes." It was, as we all are supposed to know, found at Cologne some years ago; it was since our last writing discovered in Ireland, and found out—not to be the right sort. In order that no mistake may occur in future about its presence and its performances, the Farmer has published as a supplement a correct coloured life-like lithograph of the wretch in all its stages, from its larva state to its full-grown habit. All potatoe growers, therefore, knowing its appearance, can at once "stamp it out" without the aid of inspectors or policemen, at first thought advisable by the authorities to collar it on its first surreptitious arrival at principal ports in this country, where it has not yet appeared, nor likely to come, in its jaundiced-like guise.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.——Congratulations all over the country as to the quickness of settling the rinderpest—getting rid of the obnoxious visitor altogether—were, it appears, too early made. The Cattle Plague has been again discovered in the East End, and an Order in Council in an extraordinary Gazette issued on Monday evening prohibits the removal of all cattle north of the Thames except for immediate slaughter, an order which does not seem to alter much that at present in force, for no stock can go out of the cordon.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Board of Trade Returns for the six months may be called a turning point in our year. The meat question has been the great one for the last six months. It has been the subject of talk on exchange, in markets, and farms, and the conclusion seems to have been arrived at by some that foreign cattle should not be permitted, and that dead meat is the article to "go in for." These official returns prove that there is a diminution in the imports of live cattle, which is easy of understanding considering Cattle Plague restrictions, but there is also a reduction in bacon and salted beef, and not so much increase in fresh meat as to keep down prices.—Live cattle from the States and the Dominion have been reaching our shores in first-class condition. One animal arriving at Liverpool last week weighed, it is stated, about 30 cwts., heavier than Mr. M'Combie's Black Prince which took championship at Smithfield some years ago, and from whose carcase the Queen bought a baron.—Colonel Kingscote has been elected president for the Royal Agricultural Society, which next year is to be held at Bristol.—The Agricultural Gazette states that the visitors' books at Tiptree Hall Farm, containing the signatures and remarks of Mr. Mechi's visitors for a period of over thirty years, have been offered to and accepted by the authorities of the British Museum. The first volume, containing the signatures for the first fifteen years, is now in the Museum, and the second volume is being bound.

A CELEBRATED STICK



EARLY in 1802 a transport left the Cape of Good Hope and conveyed home the 91st Argyll Highlanders, Princess Louise's Regiment. It was attacked by a sword-fish, which left sticking in the timbers a portion of its ivory weapon 33½ inches long. This became the property of Andrew M'Lean, afterwards the regimental sergeant-major, who made it into a walking stick as shown in our illustration, and by him it was carried during the whole of his service in the Peninsular War. Fighting in the south of France, at Waterloo, and at Cambray, and with the Army of Occupation at Paris, Sergeant-Major M'Lean was promoted to a Lieutenancy, and having been specially recommended by the late General Sir Charles Rowan, he was appointed Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police in London, in which post he served for many years, and ultimately retired to Boulogne on a pension of 120*l.* a year, where Col. Browne found him residing, when that officer retired from the command of the Dublin Metropolitan Police. Lieut. M'Lean died in August, 1869, and Col. Browne, deeming that this relic of its war services would be acceptable to Col. Gordon and his regiment, transmitted the staff to Dover to be the property of the regiment in all times coming, and to be handed over to its successive sergeant-majors. The names of the battles it was carried in are inscribed on eight plates of solid gold, and it is now used on parades with all honour by the sergeant-major on the anniversaries of the battles named below:—

THE CAVES OF ADELSBERG

AT a distance of five or six hours' rail from Gratz lies the small Austrian village of Adelsberg. It offers visitors good air and a pleasant situation amidst smooth-rolling hills and adjacent pine forests. But for the various classes of travellers who are in search of novelty, beauty, or fresh wonders to investigate, its great attraction lies in the neighbouring stalactitic caverns known, since their rediscovery in the beginning of this century, as the "Caves of Adelsberg." They take their name from an insignificant village covering a few acres; but for themselves they have already been explored for several miles, and there are numerous evidences that prove almost conclusively their extent over a vast area. Two of these may be mentioned. Pieces of wood thrown into the river Poik, within the grottos, reappear in a stream that issues from a cave ten miles off. And a drive of an hour and a half takes the traveller to the Château of Luegg—a strange, rambling old place, a former abode of brigands, built in the very mouth of caves precisely resembling those of Adelsberg, and which branch on the one hand towards them, on the other lead you over rugged floors of sand, dark pools, and rocks as far, apparently, as curiosity will induce you to go. A mile and a half of the slippery break-neck journey satisfied us, as we had already made a thorough scrutiny on two occasions into the marvels of the more accessible and better managed Caves of Adelsberg throughout nearly five miles of their extent. But that mile and a half showed one thing worth noting here, in the hope that future attention may be directed to verify and explain it. Whilst every portion of the Adelsberg rocks, and every obtainable specimen of the stalactites, is intensely hard, the specimens I collected in the grottos of Luegg are very brittle. It is just possible that in the more frequented caves everything easily destructible has been carried off; but it seems scarcely probable that the difference can be attributable to such a cause. There is another singular fact to be remarked. As has been already said, there is a strong resemblance between the Caves of Luegg and Adelsberg, but at the same time the whole appearance of the former proclaims them to be in an earlier stage of development. In the Caves of Adelsberg you find innumerable gigantic pillars reaching from lofty dome to floor. In those of Luegg you discover capitals depending from the roof above pedestals that are rising from the floor, while the intermediate columns have yet to be filled in by the silent stonemasons. At Adelsberg gigantic stalactites hang from the roofs, huge and sparkling as the mammoth chandelier sent from Salviati's, in Venice, to grace the Pope's Jubilee. At Luegg the roofs are studded with small projections that remind one rather of the whitewashed mouths of gas tubes into which the chandeliers should be screwed. There are occasional great masses in the latter caves, but they appear to be masses of the original rock encrusted with stalactites, and not absolute individual stalactites themselves like those of Adelsberg. For instance, in the grottos of Adelsberg, about two miles from the entrance, you come upon what has been well named "The Cascade"—a beautiful cream-coloured petrifaction that flows over from the wall far above overhead down to the ground. You see the full wave, and run, and curling edge of the apparently transfixed waters, and they shine as though stray moonbeams had been caught in them at the instant that their imaginary flow was arrested. In Luegg the guides point out also a "cascade;" but on this more leaden-hued boulder the creamy water-drops have as yet scarcely settled into fully discernible ripples, and the crystal sheen is wanting.

As the stalactites and stalagmites form at the rate of little more than the thickness of this paper in a lifetime, it is impossible to avoid the inference that a considerable period must have elapsed between the epochs when the almost invisible agencies commenced work in the two different series of caverns, and yet it is equally difficult not to feel certain that they are both portions of one vast system of grand galleries, all excavated by the same convulsion of Nature. However, there is little doubt that soon full light will be thrown upon this question. Although not even so many as ten of our countrymen, we were told, have extended their journeys so far south from Vienna, or east from Venice, during the last two years, it is to be hoped that no long time hence these caverns will be as well known and intimately studied by English travellers as they already are by many thousands of the neighbouring Austrian peasantry, who crowd to the annual Whit Monday festival given, for their pleasure, in the Caves of Adelsberg, which are then illuminated with twenty thousand lights, and present a most brilliant and animated spectacle. The Caves of Luegg afford interest for some minds only; but their neighbours have an abundance of beauty for the satisfaction of all, while the company, in whose hands they are, have done much to lessen the fatigue of their exploration. Steps have been cut from corridors to galleries, and bridges thrown across the dark, turbulent waters of the River Poik, a bright, sparkling thread without, within the caves not inaptly called "the Styx." Then a tramway laid down in 1872, and furnished with light iron carriages, helps the visitor comfortably over nearly two miles of the journey into the earth's heart. Guides walk beside the cars to point out, now a natural pulpit, with gleaming sounding board overhead; then an opera-box, with rounded cushion to lean on, edged with white fringe and tassels. There are innumerable resemblances to the Byzantine twisted pillars; but their incrustations appear to consist chiefly of diamonds, although coloured morsels are not wholly wanting. There are round columns, and columns fluted with the most wonderful regularity; and there is a beautiful resemblance to an organ, that appears to have been made, pipes and all, out of pure white marble. There is also a singular appearance of the side of an old castle. The lofty wall is white; high up there is a deep, almost perfectly even, oblong aperture, filled in with what looks like a dark brown wooden shutter; below it, reaching to the ground, is another aperture filled in with the brown door. The effect is almost startling. Indeed, in many instances it would be impossible to help thinking that human hands had aided to work out some of the vivid likenesses, if it were not still more impossible to believe that man's puny fingers had been able to interfere with such colossal works. In some places whole sets of Hindoo idols, with their flat hands on drawn-up knees, seem to test, to the uttermost, belief in their untouched, natural origin; and a grandly calm Sphynx appears to demand attention to the fact that she is the original mother of all her enigmatical children. Our guides pointed out to us at one part "the Garden"—bower, rather, it should be called—where some old Midas seems to have turned trailing plants, flowers, vases, and statuettes, not to gold, indeed, but to a uniform substance of crystal inlaid with silver. And there is a "Curtain," as transparent as fine muslin, and whose graceful draping might afford a lesson to an artist. The guides have special delight also in pointing out most laughable resemblances to many ordinary objects. As though Nature had occasionally, during the lapse of ages, grown weary or surfeited with its own abundant production of beauty, and turned to the common-place and practical for relief, the guides' elevated torches sometimes reveal to astonished eyes whole strings of big, reddish-brown Bologna sausages, rashers of "streaky breakfast bacon," and bundles of rather warm-looking wax candles, hanging from the ceiling of Nature's larder; while a "Parrot," perched on a bit of fallen column, holds its head on one side in a most knowing manner.

Having passed the spacious and lofty "Ball-room," in which the peasants dance most vigorously on Whit Monday, in the midst of a dense throng, the tram-cars have to be left, and the next mile or so must be traversed on foot, passing up and down the steep winding path called "the Semmering Pass." The extra fatigue is more than repaid by the extra beauty. None should turn back until they reach the seats on "Mount Calvary." The farther you go the more beautiful these Caves become, until the last ones seem almost like masses of snow-wreaths intermingled with hoards of diamonds and topazes, while the effect of vast white domes hung with the natural glittering brown banners is exquisite beyond belief. It is useless to say anything of "the roof of Milan Cathedral," for anything approaching the truth must sound like exaggeration to those who have not seen it, and those who shall see it will confess it is difficult to say enough.

Proposing visitors may be glad, in conclusion, to learn that a large and very comfortable hotel, the Adelsberger Hof, has been opened the last year or so, within ten minutes' walk of the entrance to the Caves; and the routes, either from Trieste or Vienna, are beautiful, the latter especially so, as it takes in the Semmering Pass. Tourists leaving Trieste by the 6.50 A.M. train (express) get to Adelsberg in time for a ten o'clock breakfast; but those who prefer to take the 7.10 A.M. train still have ample time to pay a long visit to the Caves the same day, and can go on the next morning at nine o'clock to Vienna, or the half-way station, Gratz.

New Music

MESSRS. J. B. CRAMER AND CO.——A song for a mezzo-soprano, entitled "Who will go a Maying?" E. Oxenford and J. L. Roeckel, will please many.—By the same composer is a song, "Still Hope On," the words of which, by C. P. Harris, contain some salutary advice for the present age, and are superior in merit to the music.—Appropriate for all seasons is a song for a baritone, written and composed by B. K. Phillips and R. Stanley, the title of which is "Easting," both words and music are spirited and nervous.—"Jack's Weddin'" is the somewhat inappropriate title of a song composed by A. Camall, the words by F. E. Weatherley, for the matrimonial alliance is only a thing of the sailor's future,—vague and uncertain,—nevertheless at a seaside concert this song would make a decided hit.—Most of our readers will remember with pleasure Odoardo Barri's pathetic vocal composition, "The Shadow of the Cross," to which this composer has now written a sequel, called "Passion Flowers," and very wisely dedicated it to Madame Trebelli-Bettini, than whom few, if any, singers could do more ample justice to the subject. The devotional and heart-moving words are by H. B. Farnie, who therein shows his powers of treating successfully grave as well as gay themes.—Enthusiastic lovers of either sex will sing with enjoyment, "We Meet Again," the sentimental words and music of which are by R. A. Lejoindre and C. H. R. Marriott; the compass is from C below the lines to F on the fifth line.—A wholesome and vigorous antidote to the above is a really witty comic song by H. B. Farnie, "The Girl in the Eel-Skin Dress;" the words and music are very laughable, but void of vulgarity, and the frontispiece is but a mild burlesque of the prevailing fashions.

WILLIAM CZERNY.——A sweet little spring song is "Like the Lark" (Die Lerche), by Franz Abt, the English version by W. Czerny.—Somewhat more ambitious, but equally pleasing, is "The Flower's Fate," written and composed by J. S. Lyons and E. Marlois.—Sea songs for female voices are not very often to be met with, hence "Jack's Vow," the cheerful words of which are by E. Oxenford, the music by W. C. Levey, will be in great request at seaside penny readings this coming autumn.—Nos. 25 and 26 of "Popular and Celebrated Choruses for Ladies' Voices" are "In Young May," by F. Abt, and "In Early Spring," by J. B. Wekerlin; both are likely to become favourites in the home circle.—The most popular series of the day, in its special line, is "Momens de Loisir, Morceaux Classiques et Populairs pour Violon et Piano," by William Czerny, all of which arrangements are admirable and worthy of their designation. Nos 10 to 12 are respectively "Gigue in C" (Corelli)—by the same composer a "Gigue in A," Haydn's celebrated "Bagpipe Minuet," and Gottschalk's "Berceuse."—Two showy and taking pianoforte pieces are "Carolina," a serenade valse by Madame Oury, and "Festa Napolitana, by F. Coletti.

MESSRS. WOOD AND CO.——Sentimental words and a flowing melody will find favour with many singers of medium voices for "'Tis Many, Many Years Ago," the joint production of Messrs. Martin L. Hill and H. S. Roberts.—Henry Houseley has effectively set to music Barry Cornwall's quaint poem, "The Best of All Good Company."—Full of pathos and genuine sentiment is a poem by Thomas Hood, "These Eyes that were so Bright, Love." These words have inspired F. J. Simpson to compose a really charming melody for them; this song promises to win more than mere passing favour. By the same composer, who has proved equally successful when writing for the pianoforte, are eight very brief pieces, some of which are but half a page in extent; they are well worthy the trouble of committing to memory. "Short Pieces" is the appropriate title of this collection.—"A Boat Song," by Walter Spinney, and a "Gavotte" by H. Houseley, will be found useful for pianoforte school practice and holiday performance.—Book IV. of "Wood and Co.'s Organ Library" contains a "Middle Voluntary," by J. C. Richardson; "Concluding Voluntary," by T. Troman, Mus. Bac.; Andante in D major, by Walter Spinney; and a "Concluding Voluntary," by F. W. Pacey, Mus. Bac., all of which are well written compositions, worthy of a place in the library of every organist who can play moderately well, as they are free from any serious difficulties.—Few can fail to endorse the sentiment of the late A. H. Clough's "How Pleasant it is to Have Money!" which J. Owen has wedded to a blithesome melody.—A "Triumphal March in G" for the organ, composed by S. G. R. Coles, shows talent in the present and gives promise of excellence in the future.—Two excellent pianoforte pieces for practice and execution are, "The Song of the Mill Wheel," a sketch by D. Middleton, and "Les Murmures du Ruisseau," an idyll by F. Braungardt.—Easy, tuneful, but commonplace are "The Balmoral Caledonians," by C. D'Egville Michau.

HOTEL
G. DURAND

THE COUNTRY"

ON AND OFF THE "PANTILES"

"TUNBRIDGE WELLS," says lively Fanny Burney, writing in 1779 (she wasn't Madame d'Arblay then), "is a place that to me appeared very singular; the country is all rock, and every part of it is either up or down hill, scarce ten yards square being level ground in the whole place; the houses, too, are scattered about in a strange wild manner, and look as if they had been dropt where they stand by accident." Could the author of "Evelina" now revisit this agreeable locality, after the quasi-century that has elapsed since she and the Thrales took up their quarters at the Sussex Hotel, what a change would come over the spirit of her dream! True, the leading features of the Spa are unaltered; the rocks and hills remain as nature placed them, the latter presenting the same impediments to the progress of stout gentlemen as they did in the days of yore, and utterly discomfiting those nuisances of modern civilisation,—perambulators and bicycles.

But, in other respects, time has worked wonders; the scattered houses have become streets; Mount Sion and Mount Ephraim, though retaining their old Biblical appellations, have been long since transformed into compact masses of bricks, mortar, and stucco; and even the "dirty little lanes" of which Miss Fanny contemptuously speaks are now lined with shops especially attractive to the indigenous youngsters, the principal articles exposed for sale therein being cheap cricket-bats and "Turkish delight." The Sussex Hotel has vanished, and the Calverley and the Wellington reign in its stead; of these fashion has adopted the first, while bracing air and a glorious prospect recommend the second; Mount Ephraim also has its caravansary overlooking the common, and, if one may judge of its prosperity from the perpetual locomotion of the omnibus connected with it, ought to be a thriving concern.

You may lodge anywhere in Tunbridge Wells; either in the above-mentioned establishments, if a mere bird of passage, or, if tempted to prolong your stay, in one of the innumerable villas clustered about in every direction, each with its tiny grass plot in front and its miniature garden behind, where, if solitude be your object, you may enjoy a silence unbroken, save by the twittering of the birds, or the occasional hum of an adventurous bee. Nay, even if your temporary lot be cast in less pleasant places, and the only verdure discernible from your "apartments," be your landlady's slender slip of turf enlivened with dusty marigolds, you have but to ask your way to the "Grove," and a more secluded shady spot you will hardly find anywhere. It is, at a rough calculation, about an acre and a-half in extent, and accessible through Calverley Park on one side, and by a passage communicating with the High Street on the other; benches, conveniently disposed at the foot of wide-spreading old trees, and rarely occupied save by a solitary student (the specimen I saw had fallen asleep over the county paper) or a stray nursery maid with her infant charges, invite you to repose, and, if the sun shines fiercely, believe me, you might do worse.

The amusements offered to the sojourners at the Wells are of a very primitive character, consisting chiefly of the privilege of walking up and down the common, or up and down the Pantiles (I cannot bring myself to adopt the new fangled title of Parade), or of investigating in their own or hired vehicles the different objects of interest in the neighbourhood. Not that there is an absolute dearth of evening recreation; the German Reed Company, Mrs. Stirling, and the inevitable Vance having, during my stay, successively (and I trust successfully) issued their invitation cards; not to mention a remarkably flaring bill of vast dimensions adorning every blank wall in the vicinity, and announcing the arrival of Herr something or other (name not material), the inimitable and never-to-be-sufficiently-appreciated conjuror and prestidigitateur. But, barring these exceptional invasions of wandering stars, it must be confessed that the visitors are left pretty much to their own resources, or to those afforded them by the circulating libraries, the latter alternative involving, from the paucity of stock in hand, a larger consumption of three-volume novels than is positively wholesome.

A late able lawyer, when asked to describe Tunbridge Wells, laconically replied, "dust and dullness;" without presuming to question the correctness of the assertion, both charges being in a certain degree well founded, I would suggest the addition to the verdict of "extenuating circumstances." The sandy soil naturally produces the first of these grievances, which might be, to say the least, mitigated by a more efficient system of watering; it has, however, the advantage of drying as quickly as the cliff at Brighton, and of becoming, ten minutes after the hardest downpour, practical for the most delicate bottine. Then, as to dulness, that depends a great deal on the interpretation of the term; if it be intended to signify the almost total absence of balls, parties, and similar post-prandial gatherings, there is no gainsaying the fact, and those who need them had better migrate elsewhere; but that the general aspect of the Wells is the reverse of bright or cheerful I deny in toto.

Stroll along the High Street, penetrate through one of the narrow openings at its extremity leading to the Pantiles, and from thence emerge upon the Old London Road; and if during your walk you have found nothing either to interest or amuse you, then retrace your steps back to the railway station and bon voyage! But if what you have seen induces you to continue, and no asthmatic tendencies impede your climbing powers, the common is before you, with its yellow gorse and purple heath, its invigorating breezes and enchanting view of the neighbouring villa-crowned heights that bear a faint resemblance to the valley of the Arno. There you may sit or lounge at your ease, luxuriously indulging in the calumet of peace, or absorbed in the concluding chapters of a fascinating story; while ever and anon your reverie or study (as the case may be) is interrupted by the sudden advent of a juvenile donkey party, or by the cavalcade of Mr. Cramp, the riding master, chaperoning a bevy of inexperienced Amazons, bobbing up and down like floats in a fish-pond. Every available bit of level space is occupied by cricketers of all ages and all sizes, the youthful element largely predominating; and considering that the fielders have perpetually to pursue the ball as it bounds far away down the slopes, the "out" side has generally a hard time of it.

The regular cricket ground is situated at the summit of the common, nearly opposite the Wellington Hotel; and although its undulating propensities would scarcely be appreciated by the patrons of the "Oval," affords a very tolerable arena for the display of such talent as the Wells and its vicinity can bring together. There exists, I believe, a club called the "Blue Mantles," but the prowess of its members is unknown to me; the only matches I had an opportunity of witnessing being "scratch" ones, organised by the townspeople. One of these in particular appeared mightily to tickle the fancy of the bystanders; the players, with the exception of a single individual clad in correct cricket costume, evidently regarding uniformity of attire as a superfluous adjunct to the game. The wicket-keeper, for instance, wore tightly-fitting black trousers, with a handkerchief round his knee by way of pad; the "point" looked extremely knowing in a fur cap, very much cocked on one side; the principal bowler sported a striped livery waistcoat, while the remainder of the field, including the long stop whom, from his grimy exterior, I at once set down for a blacksmith, patronised shirt-sleeves and corduroys. It turned out to be a very one-sided affair, the flannel jacket and the livery waistcoat heading the successful eleven, and remorselessly levelling their adversaries' stumps like so many ninepins. When the latter did get a chance, they usually contrived to send the ball into the hands of "point," or to start for a run—think better of it—and return just in time to find the bails deftly removed by the wicket-keeper; in short, the innings lasted scarcely an hour, and when I left the ground, the flannel jacket, a sort of Admirable Crichton in his way, had scored almost as many runs as his opponents all together.

Ten minutes' further walk westward brings us to Rusthall Common, with its rural church and cemetery on our left and a natural monstrosity called the Toad Rock on our right; the approach to the latter is guarded by a detachment of small boys deserting the blackberry bushes in the anticipation of halfpence, which boon having been accorded or refused, they disappear among the brambles, and are seen no more. Returning homewards, I would recommend the admirer of quiet sylvan scenery not to pass unnoticed or unvisited the pleasant avenue leading through Hurst Wood into Bishop's Down Park, the favourite resort of loving couples and meditative smokers; the park itself, being a mere tract of land devoted to building purposes, may safely be left unexplored.

And now, without further infringing on the stereotpyed privileges of the guide-book, or planning out excursions which people in general prefer choosing for themselves, let us rather attempt to sketch the real feature of Tunbridge Wells, the Pantiles, and, to do our subject justice, adjourn thither at the orthodox hour any time between eleven and one. "How such a place," remarks Miss Burney, "could first be made a fashionable pleasure walk everybody must wonder." So probably thought Dr. Johnson, when thirty years earlier he gravely mingled with the beau monde of his day, conversing familiarly with Garrick and Colley Cibber, and perhaps not entirely disregarding the fascinating Miss Chudleigh, who in her turn, we may be sure, was by no means chary of her airs and graces for the benefit of the future Lord Chatham and Speaker Onslow. Narrow and confined, however, as is this time-honoured promenade, bounded by shops on one side and by steps leading to more shops on the other, it is nevertheless the great centre of attraction, and scarcely have the ten or twelve musicians composing the local band taken up their position beneath the trees in the centre of the walk than every bench is occupied as if by magic, enterprising cavaliers invade the shops as unconcernedly as if they had known their owners all their lives, and bear off in triumph, for the accommodation of their fair companions, as many chairs and camp-stools as they can lay their hands on.

Meanwhile the programme of the concert has been adjusted to the trunk of a tree, old ladies prepare their knitting needles, a pretty nursemaid (a fixture here) lays herself out for admiration, and a tremendously tall young fellow with a glass in his eye escorts the best-looking girl in the place to a seat commanding a comprehensive view of the entire scene. Already the cornet-a-piston and the bassoon are hard at work on a selection from Meyerbeer, and Paterfamilias, with his daughter on his arm, beats time—rather irregularly—with the ferule of his umbrella; a trio of exquisites in tweed and wideawake saunter indolently up and down from the Post Office to the milk bun establishment at the corner and back again, glancing approvingly at two simply, but becomingly, dressed ladies, sitting apart from the rest, and diffusing far and wide the odour of their cigarettes just purchased from an enticing marchande with fabulously piled up hair of variegated hues. Meyerbeer has been long since laid aside for Suppé's overture to "Poet and Peasant," followed by a waltz and a pot-pourri from Lucrezia Borgia, and the pretty nursemaid, whose little charge is inclined to be fractious, dandles it listlessly to and fro, invariably turning her profile (her best point) towards the passers by. Now and then some adventurous damsel descends the steps conducting to the spring, and imbibes a glass of the icy cold liquid, hoping inwardly that the iron will not spoil her teeth, and thinking (if she be a travelled young lady) how much nicer it would be to exchange the present surroundings for the loveliness of the Poubon at Spa. Stout elderly dames block up the fronts of the shop windows, staring alternately at the photographs and the work-boxes and card-cases in Tunbridge ware; children, dispatched by maternal order in quest of Papa, make an irruption into the reading-room, and carry off the old gentleman before he has half-finished his paper; and during all this va et vient the musicians, hoarse and weary, and thirsting for the product of Kentish hops, have been steadily getting through number after number of the programme, and are on the point of attacking a galop by way of finale.

This is the signal for a general break-up; the men start off for billiards or a country walk, while the fair sex charter flies, and bargain pitilessly with the drivers thereof; the pretty nursemaid casts a lingering look behind as she departs for the one o'clock dinner; the shop-keepers, as soon as the coast is clear, sally forth to recapture their chairs and retreat with them into their dens; and half an hour later, if the shades of the great lexicographer and Madame d'Arblay were to meet on the Pantiles and compare notes, they would most assuredly find themselves alone in their glory. RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

MR. ROBERT BUCHANAN, in his later works, has shown one special phase of the poet-nature which, more than anything else, entitles him to the respect, and we may add the love, of all kindred natures, viz., intense and true sympathy. Everybody already knew how great was his metrical facility—shown significantly, to those who can judge, by the fact that he is one of the few modern poets who can write a new ballad that reads like an old one. His power of description was also known of old, as were other excellencies too many to number; but it seems to us that only of late years has he himself become sensible of the full existence of that Humanity which must always lie at the depths of the highest poetry. "Balder the Beautiful: a Song of Divine Death," by Robert Buchanan (W. Mullan and Son), is the latest and most triumphant outcome of this awakening. It is possible—nay, highly probable—that it will not be as universally admired as, for instance, "Red Rose and White," for the very simple reason that its perfect appreciation involves an amount of serious thought and study such as, in this railway age, people are too often unwilling to give. Yet none the less is it a noble poem, to be cherished by those who can appreciate high thoughts wedded to almost faultless music. The lovers of Scandinavian mythology may regret—as we must own to doing—the alteration of the old legend; but if we, according to the author's warning, disabuse our minds of ancient prejudice, there remains nothing but admiration for a delicate and wonderfully imaginative allegory. The key note of the poem lies, we think, in three stanzas from the finest portion of the work, "The Coming of the Other":—

"But whosoe'er shall conquer Death,
  Though mortal man he be,
Shall in his season rise again,
  And live, with thee, and Me!

And whosoe'er loves mortals most
  Shall conquer Death the best,
Yea, whosoe'er grows beautiful
  Shall grow divinely blest."

The White Christ raised His shining face
  To that still bright'ning sky:
Only the beautiful shall abide,
  Only the base shall die!

In short, it is the sublimity of self-sacrifice that is preached—a lesson only too sorely needed,—and taught in such flowing lyric measures, such stately rhythm of blank verse, that surely some will hear the teacher. Did space permit we could gladly give long extracts from other portions of the work; but we must content ourselves with an indication of some of the most striking passages. Such are the description of morning on the lake at page 26; Balder's dream, and, later on, his pursuit of Death; the scene where the sea-beasts nestle at the feet of the Sun-God, and, which is perhaps the grandest of all, "The Bridge of Ghosts." Balder's prayer, fine as it is, strikes us as being written in a metre unfortunately suggestive of lighter subjects—this is a mere matter of taste. The poem, as a whole, remains a sublime one.

There is just one drawback to "The Meda Maiden, and Other Poems," by the Earl of Southesk, K.T. (Macmillan), which is that, despite its musical numbers,, it is nearly impossible to get up much interest in the chief poem. North American Indians are, practically, rather unromantic, and the history of the converted witch-wife was hardly worthy of the author's undoubted powers. We cannot share his great admiration for "Hiawatha;" and although there are good passages in "The Meda Maiden," such as the digression on bigotry and the description of the novice's vision, we have found it a trifle dull. "The Chamorra," a ghastly story of lycanthropy, is much more to our taste. It is every bit as musical, and has a weird power which impels at least a transient belief in the horrible legend. Joana's prophecy is exceedingly strong, both dramatically and as poetry pure and simple. Of the minor pieces, the best are "The Flitch of Dunmow," which one wants to sing whilst reading it, "A Honey-Bee Parable," and "Frankie." This last ought to find a place in all future volumes of poems intended for children.

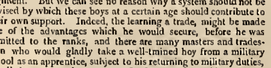
"A Dream of the Gironde, and Other Poems," by Evelyn Pine (Smith, Elder, and Co.), is tolerably correct throughout as to its versification, but also rather heavy. The chief fault in the dramatic description of Madame Roland's fate is that the speeches are far too long and didactic. One of them, however, by Théroigne de Méricourt, when she confronts her craven seducer, is really fine and impassioned. The song at p. 160, in a very long and rather unintelligible rhapsody called "Thistle Blossom," is painfully suggestive of a banjo accompaniment. The author seems to be an ardent admirer of the "music of the future."—"Harry," by the author of "Mrs. Jerningham's Journal" (Macmillan), is not worthy of the writer who penned that charming domestic idyll. It is rather an attempt to imitate "Maud." There is a grossly improbable rescue of a supposed dead man, and some very uncomfortable rhythm in places. We think the author could do better than this.—"The Token of the Silver Lily," by Helen Mathers (Bentley), also shows signs of the Poet Laureate's influence. It is, in fact, a clever imitation of some of Mr. Tennyson's mediæval poems; but, though careful and studied, the blank verse has scarcely the genuine ring. Harold was certainly a fine fellow, and the portions of the tale in which he appears are amongst the strongest; but the author is too fond of ending her lines with a weak syllable, and would, we think, have made the tale of Ethelwyn's love more effective in prose.—If "Boyhood Lays," by William Henry Thomas (Trubner), are really what they profess to be, we can only pity the boy who thinks and writes in such a fashion, and advise him, in all sober earnest, to seek an instructor who may help him to better thoughts. We refrain from applying the sternest censure to a hideous verse at p. 40, but will only ask the author how he can excuse it on the ground of mere good taste?—Perhaps we are ourselves to blame for being disappointed in "Pegasus Re-saddled," by H. Cholmondeley Peanell (Henry S. King). We went to it with such delightful recollections of the former work, that it may have been impossible that the expectations raised should be fulfilled. At all events, the book is not equal to its predecessor, though it has some good things in it, such as "Rinking Reminiscences," "To an Anonymous Correspondent," and "The World's Mine Oyster." But at times the author seems to have written hurriedly, the verses do not strike one as spontaneous, and he really ought to know better than to rhyme "lost" and "Faust!"—"Poems of Places," edited by Henry W. Longfellow (Macmillan), is rather a good idea—viz., to give a selection of passages, more or less well known, from the different writers who have dwelt metrically either upon places in England and Wales, or with their associations. The work has been very fairly carried out. It would be absurd to expect that such a book should not leave something to be desired. For instance, we miss "The Fakenham Ghost;" there is a good English ballad extant on "The Luck of Edenhall;" "Piers Ploughman" should hardly be given as an author's name—surely the editor must have heard of "Langland!" and it is at least doubtful what share Shakespeare had in the celebration of Anne Hathaway's charms! But, as a general collection, the two volumes have their value.—The "Globe" edition of "The Poetical Works of John Milton" (Macmillan) is a very good one. The type is large and clear, which is a desideratum; and the worth of the book is enhanced by Professor Masson's prefaces, some of which are already well known to students, especially that which deals with the scheme of "Paradise Lost."

FOOD FOR POWDER

THOSE whose business or pleasure takes them to Westminster must have remarked the constant presence of military uniforms. The martial figures that pace so persistently the pavement of George Street, or stand so erect at the corner of Parliament Street are evidently picked men; their presence is good and their manners are affable, but there is a keen watchfulness in their eyes and a restless scanning of the horizon which betokens that they are no mere loungers, but are upon duty or business of some sort; in fact they are recruiting sergeants, whose office it is to receive the casual inquirer with open arms, to reassure the timid, to lend decision to the wavering, and to convert the scoffer, And very able proselytisers they are. If one took the trouble to observe their proceedings it would be seen that every now and then one or other of them was accosted, that a conference which commenced amicably suddenly became confidential, and that an inevitable adjournment to a hospitable public house followed. Into the mysteries there disclosed to the neophyte we do not care to inquire too closely: we fear that recruiting sergeants very often draw the bow with a very strong arm indeed. A visit next morning to the recruiting offices in the yard of the National Gallery would not unfrequently suggest the thought that the process of initiation must have been a severe one, for an air of dissipation lies heavily upon not a few of the faces present. There they are, however—some sullen, some defiant, and some repentant, and some again (of the better class) composed and at their ease. The reasons which have induced them to enlist are various, but in by far the greater number of cases privation and absolute want will be found to be the predisposing causes. This is proved, if proof were necessary, by the fact that in the winter months recruiting goes on with redoubled vigour. There are many who enlist at that season, however, with the full intention of deserting when spring comes round again. Upon the whole it may be said that our recruits are not drawn from the most respectable sources, and that there is a screw loose somewhere in most of their histories. It is wonderful that with such material to work with such grand results can be obtained. Discipline, however, is a great thing, and we agree with Carlyle that it would be well if all men were drilled, not merely to keep step in marching, but to act in harmony and unison in the every-day matters of life. As Wesley puts it—the kite that chafed at the string which held it in, fell to the ground when that string was cut. But discipline cannot do everything, and what we require most of all is a better class of recruits. The subject is now engaging a large share of attention, and there is a great diversity of opinions as to the means by which this end is to be obtained. The increase of pay offered has had some effect in raising both the number of enlistments and the quality of the "raw material," and the system of deferred pay will undoubtedly prove a safeguard against desertion, and a strong incentive to good conduct. But these small advantages are very insufficient inducements to good men; we cannot pretend to compete with the labour market in the payment of actual wages, and it is difficult to make men regard payment in kind with any sort of favour. The idea of restraint, too, is irksome, and they refuse to believe that the plentiful food, warm clothing, comfortable sleeping rooms, and light work of the soldier, together with medical attendance and comforts in sickness, are any equivalent for the higher wages and much too abundant beer of the labourer or artisan, coupled with the absence of discipline and freedom from supervision out of working hours. We believe, however, that a good deal of this repugnance to a military life might be overcome by a very simple expedient. If the better classes knew more about the internal economy of a regiment, could get a clearer insight into the daily life and duties of the soldier, and could be guided, by a course of sound reasoning, to arriving at a true estimate of the comparative advantages and disadvantages offered by service in the army, they would be much more disposed to entertain the idea of it. Few men like to take a leap in the dark, and it is just this feeling that restrains many of the more cautious and thoughtful of our young men.

We would suggest then the employment of lecturers who should visit our towns and tell a "plain unvarnished tale" of the conditions of a soldier's life, comparing them socially and economically with those of the working classes. The matter would be amply discussed in the newspapers, and we believe would result in a comparatively large accession of respectable men to the ranks. For it must be remembered that we want to progress in this direction, and that the first step is everything. We do not expect that the army would rise at a single bound to popularity, but if we could only see the first leavenings of a class of superior men entering it the object would have been attained. Example goes for a great deal in all the affairs of life, and if we could thus succeed in tapping another source of supply we could hope for a constant flow from it. At any rate the experiment would not be an expensive one, and might be worth trying.

We wish we could see more army schools established upon the principle of the training ships for the navy. We know the objections upon the score of expense, and that only a certain number of boys can be retained upon the strength of each regiment. But we can see no reason why a system should not be devised by which these boys at a certain age should contribute to their own support. Indeed, the learning a trade, might be made one of the advantages which he would secure, before he was admitted to the ranks, and there are many masters and tradesmen who would gladly take a well-trained boy from a military school as an apprentice, subject to his returning to military duties, if called upon to do so, at a fixed age. It would be easy to provide for his knowledge of drill being kept up, in these days when every town has its volunteer staff or regular depot.



THE READER

"Foreign Classics for English Readers," edited by Mrs. Oliphant.—I. "Dante," by the Editor (Blackwood and Sons).—The popularity of their "Ancient Classics Series" has given the Messrs. Blackwood good reason to attempt the same service for the English reader with regard to the great writers of modern Europe. The new enterprise, we strongly suspect, will prove on trial more arduous than the old. Of the ancient classics the unlearned reader asked little more than to be told pleasantly what they were all about; of the classic authors of the modern era he desires to learn much more if he learns anything at all. "Studies," critiques, translations of their works are part of the literature that everybody reads. The field is one where there are many rivals, and where audiences are somewhat critical and exacting. Still there is ample room for the new series to do service, not more to those for whom Dante and Tasso, Molière and Montaigne might otherwise remain mere names, than to those who need a guide at starting to map out the mazes of the Dantesque vision, to separate the gold from the dross through the forty and odd tomes of Goethe and Voltaire, or give the specimen sketch (which will probably suffice for good and all), of the correct classicalism of Corneille and Racine. Nor can it begin better—hardly, indeed, could it begin otherwise—than with the first of modern men who wrote on high things in the vulgar speech, the Italian father of all the new world's poetry and thought. In her bright sketch of Dante and his work Mrs. Oliphant aims above all things to write popularly, to combine (with as little as may be of the minuter criticism) a fair picture of the poet and his time—of the lover of Beatrice even more than of the passionate Ghibelline—with a complete analysis of his greatest works, the "Vita Nuova" and the "Commedia." This last, which is the larger portion of the little volume, is also on the whole the best; flowing and full, yet free from tediousness, and thickly interspersed with extracts from the literal prose translation of Dr. Carlyle or very fair poetic renderings of Mrs. Oliphant's own. Not of course a volume to supersede, or even be a substitute for, higher works of criticism on Dante, but as a popular introduction to his writings, both serviceable and tasteful.

"The Library of Contemporary Science" (Chapman and Hall)—a projected English version of the "Bibliothèque de la Science Contemporaine," a series started last year in France by MM. Reinwald and Cie.—commences well with a translation by Mr. A. H. Keane of M. Abel Hovelacque's most interesting "Science of Language." An anthropologist of the advanced school, and consequent advocate of the original plurality of languages and races, M. Hovelacque treats language as a physical science from first to last, discarding questions of etymologies and historical affinities, and preferring simply to class each family of speech in its place in one of the three great groups of monosyllabic, agglutinating, or inflected, with just so much notice as may explain its leading characteristics, and refer the student to the best authorities on its literature (if any) and its grammar. Hence his volume—though somewhat slight in parts, and not always free from over-hasty conclusions—is everywhere clear and readable to a degree not often reached when dealing with a science so abstruse. Mr. Keane, too, we should add, is by no means a mere translator, but a contributor in his turn of notes and additions of independent value, and of a most useful numbered map and tabular appendix for finding at a glance the name and history of the language of any known country on the globe.

"Turks and Greeks" (Macmillan and Co.), by the Hon. Dudley Campbell—the tiny note-book of an autumn run to Constantinople and Athens—tells little, of course, that is really new to serious students of the Eastern Question. But it is a modest, pleasant little book, well suited, we should say, for the homely lecture-rooms in which it first took substantial form, and with much that is quite worth reproducing in the shape of interviews and encounters en route. Apropos, by the way, of Greek aspirations, Mr. Campbell tells us, on the authority of a fair Perote, that her countrymen expect, among other things "in five-and-twenty or thirty years to have gone back completely" to Old Greek. What if the language of Xenophon and Demosthenes should reappear at Athens as a living speech, just at the time when it will probably have ceased to be taught in all but a few classes of a few schools abroad?

What profits it, one is sometimes inclined to ask, to reproduce with more or less effects, the hackneyed objections to orthodox Christianity, the contradictions real or seeming in the text of Scripture (in either case so easy to set forth plausibly, so hard to explain or justify to the unlearned), the à priori difficulties of a scheme not always consonant with human wishes? Is the world wiser or better for such efforts, or is not after all dogmatic faith the very life-blood of the morality of the many? Of two volumes now before us of this class "Our Creed, by a Barrister" (Chapman and Hall)—an essay ending logically in simple Theism—is on the whole the abler; marshalling objections with something of the method of the trained advocate, yet far from free on the other hand from assumptions hardly to be accepted as indisputable, e.g., that "Nature" (as opposed to Scripture) "proclaims the Deity to be a Being supremely beneficent," that the Gospels if genuine would have been written in Hebrew, &c. The other "The Religion of Jesus compared with the Christianity of To-Day" (E. W. Allen), by F. A. Binney, aims rather at the separation of the practical from the doctrinal teaching of the New Testament, with the ultimate object it would seem of substituting for the latter a mixture of Swedenborgian and Spiritualistic beliefs as to the true key to mysteries "behind the veil." In the author's arguments from "contradictory passages" in Scripture and from "Modern Christianity in Daily Life," patient examination would find, we think, not a few weak points. For championship of the orthodox side we turn to the Rev. C. A. Row's "Reasons for Believing in Christianity" (Church of England Sunday School Institute) for a very fair and popular summary—somewhat in Paley's spirit—of the evidence for those main doctrines of the Christian Faith—the Resurrection and the Ascension—on which the whole fabric must stand or fall. The arguments in particular from the consensus of early belief in favour of the essential authenticity—no matter what the exact date or authorship—of the four Gospels seems very ably and not too strongly put.

The British National Aid Society was subjected to some sharp criticism in the Turko-Servian War, chiefly perhaps—for the criticism came wholly from the pro-Servian side—because it did not think itself bound to do all things for a Government which devoted all its own resources to the militant work of the campaign. It continued, however, to do good service at Belgrade and at the front until the end; at Nisch on the Turkish side till the last day of the old year. The "Reports of its Operations" (Johnson and Sons, Castle Street) make an exceedingly interesting collection of notes from the late seat of war—both on the work of surgeons on the field, and on the physical and moral strength of Turk and Servian combatant. Clearly it is not physical strength alone that makes the Turkish Nizam live through sufferings in field and hospital which would kill London guardsmen off like flies.

That useful little manual "The Chairman's Handbook" (Knight and Co.), by Reg. F. D. Palgrave, Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, has already reached its second edition. Its specialty is the clear way in which it explains how by strict conformity to the House of Commons formula "that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the previous question," every variety of amendment, amendment of amendment, original motion, may be systematically discussed in turn without any of the indistinctness as to the point at issue, or undue prejudice to the original motion, which so often result when amendments are put simply and nakedly before the motion on which they are moved. But it contains besides full rules for the election of chairmen, speaking on questions of adjournment, consideration of reports, conduct in fine of discussions generally. Business, we take it, would be much facilitated were chairmen more at pains as a rule to study and enforce the procedure so well expounded in Mr. Palgrave's handbook.

Students of the intricacies of modern French politics will be interested in a little pamphlet by M. Eugène Ménier, the well-known editor of the Liberté Coloniale and ex-deputy for the Seine et Marne. It bears for its motto Plus de guerres Civiles, and treats of the Loi Tréveneuc, a law which was proposed by M. Tréveneuc in 1872, and subsequently passed by the National Assembly by 482 votes against 75, being specially drawn up with a view to prevent any future attempt at a coup d'état. By this law, if Parliament is illegally dissolved or is prevented from meeting, the General Councils are empowered to assemble together and choose delegates—two to each council—who are to meet in committee and take the necessary steps for the maintenance of order, and to restore to the Parliament its independence and the exercise of its rights. As this law is still in force M. Ménier argues that people need be under no fear of a repetition of 1851, for should another coup d'état be attempted the country thus has its remedy immediately to hand, an argument admirable in theory, but of which we very much doubt the efficacy when put in practice against a popular tyrant with a powerful army at his back.

Mr. W. Tegg continues his compilation of curious customs and ceremonies, and now brings out two fresh volumes. "One Hour's Reading" (W. Tegg), treats of the meaning and derivation of all kinds of queer sayings and doings, strange names, and the origin of seasons and holidays, while in "Meetings and Greetings" (W. Tegg), we are instructed in the forms and ceremonies of divers nations, both religious and civil, from Scriptural salutations down to courtly pageants of modern times. Both works are capital books of reference.—The late Dr. Andrew Wynter's papers on current topics, "Subtle Brains and Lissom Fingers" (Hardwicke and Bogue) have been republished under the direction of Dr. Steinmetz, who has revised and added to many of the articles.—The same publishers send us a pamphlet on "Gustave Doré," in which the French painter meets with rather rough treatment at the hands of Mr. W. Renton.

For a brief and comprehensive account in a cheap form of the recent voyage of the Alert and Discovery we may heartily recommend "The Arctic Expedition of 1875—6," by R. Johnston (F. Warne), which furnishes a simple and complete record of the work done by the explorers, in addition to a summary of previous research.—An energetic defence of Sir George Nares is put forth by Rear-Admiral Richards in "The Arctic Expedition of 1875—6" (E. Stanford); while Mr. Clements Markham as warmly exculpates the commander of the Expedition in "A Refutation of the Report of the Scurvy Committee" (Griffin).

"Turkey and Russia," by D. Murray Smith (T. C. Jack), is a work to be issued in fifteen parts, detailing the history of the Ottoman and Russian Empires, and their respective wars down to the present campaign. Part No. I. traces the origin of the Turkish tribes, and recounts the foundation of the Moslem Empire and the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks. Judging by the present specimen the complete work will form a valuable and trustworthy history.—The notorious irregulars of the Turkish army are briefly commented on in "Remarks on the Bashi-Bazouks, with a sketch of Gen. Beatson," by Col. Laurie (J. B. Day).

Of a batch of manuals, "Cottage Gardening," by E. Hobday (Macmillan), points out the best flowers, fruits, and vegetables for small gardens, and gives hints for their culture; "Bookbinding at Home," by S. B. McCallum (Dean and Son), suggests a useful and inexpensive occupation for boys in the holidays at the benefit of old magazines, &c.; "Laurie's Kindergarten Manual" (Central School Depôt) clearly explains and illustrates Fröbel's method, which is rapidly becoming better known and more appreciated; while a number of papers on this subject by well-known writers are collected in "Infant Education," edited by J. Laurie (Central School Depôt).

Two suitable pamphlets for the season are "Sea Air and Sea Bathing," by C. Parsons (J. and A. Churchill), and "The Sea Bathing Guide," edited by W. Abbotts (Beaumont), the former of which is the more technical, and abounds in practical directions, while the latter gives a useful list of the principal seaside resorts and their chief curative qualities.

We have also received the half-yearly volumes of The Weekly Welcome (Partridge), of Little Folks (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), which require little comment on the principle that "good wine needs no bush," and of Design and Work (G. Purkess), a magazine chiefly devoted to mechanics, and which would delight boys; two pamphlets on the temperance question, "The Proper Place of Alcohol," by a Doctor (Guest), and "Dipsomania," by S. Alford (H. K. Lewis), the latter forcibly representing the necessity of legally controlling drunkards, and summarising the bill to that effect recently laid before Parliament; an energetic attack on the Charity Organisation Society, "Words of Warning," by the veteran S. C. Hall (Hamilton, Adams), who brings forward some very striking truths and arguments; a "Service of Sacred Song, illustrative of the Life of St. Paul," by the Rev. J. Troutbeck (Church of England Sunday School Institution), containing a selection of hymns and appropriate Scripture passages; and B. and H. Morris's "List of London, Provincial, Colonial, and Foreign Newspapers (General Advertising Offices).

War Maps.——A well-executed bird's-eye view of the passages of the Danube and passes of the Balkans, showing the approaches to Constantinople through Bulgaria and Servia, has been published by Messrs. Maclure and Macdonald. This view, presumably taken from the heights of the Carpathians north of Roumania, gives an exceedingly good idea of the route to Constantinople looking south. The roads and railways are clearly marked; the principal towns are inserted; the chief geographical features of the Danube can be followed, while, more important than all, the various passes of the Balkans through which the Russians will have to penetrate are plainly distinguishable.—For those who wish to follow the progress of the Russians more minutely, Mr. Stanford, of Charing Cross, is publishing sections of a large scale map of Turkey. These sheets, of which we have just received No. 3 (from Adrianople to Northern Armenia), are remarkably distinct and comprehensive, and contain all the information regarding first and second-rate roads, streams, rivers, and small towns, necessary to the ordinary student of the present campaign.

Erratum.——For "good French novels" in our last week's notice of Mr. Morley's "Critical Miscellanies," read "good French models."

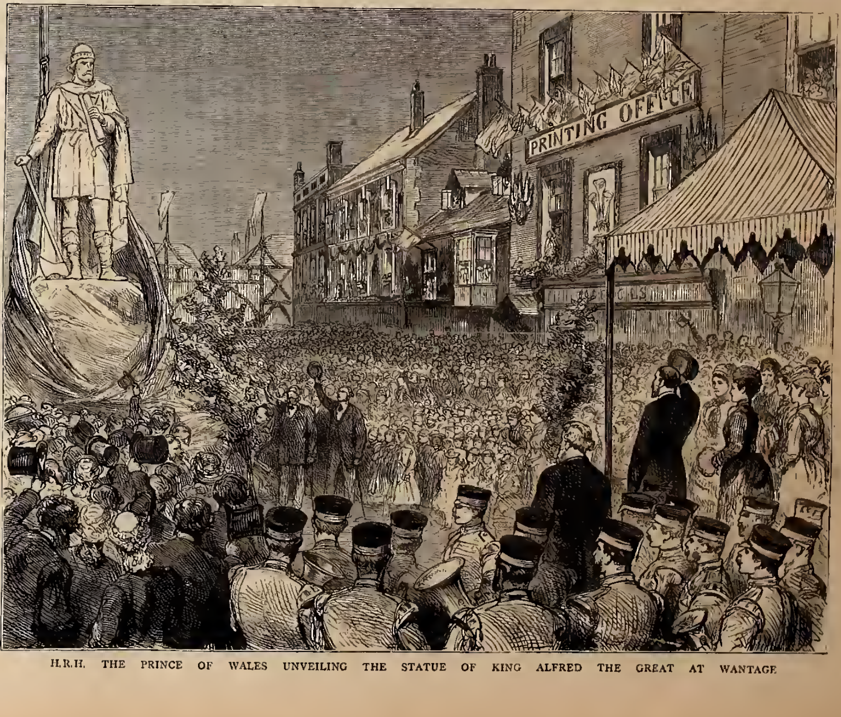
THE WAR IN THE EAST: WITH HOBART PASHA—EXAMINING A RUSSIAN SPY IN THE KONAK, SULINA



H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES UNVEILING THE STATUE OF KING ALFRED THE GREAT AT WANTAGE

The War in the East.——The Russians continue to advance rapidly through Bulgaria, and an advance guard has even crossed the Balkans from Tirnova, while the important fortress of Nikopolis on the Danube has been captured. Throughout last week the Russians were busily investing and cannonading this town, which was also warmly bombarded by the Roumanian batteries across the river. On Sunday, the 15th, the attack was renewed with greater activity, under Lieut.-General Baron Krüdener, and the Russians, gaining possession of the heights commanding the town, commenced to pour in a hurricane of shells. Upon this the garrison attempted a retreat, but, however, were prevented in this by the Russian infantry, so that at daybreak on Monday morning the Turkish commanders, Achmed and Hassan Pashas, agreed to surrender, and the town, its garrison of 6,000 men, and 40 guns, fell into the hands of the Russians, together with two monitors. The fall of Nikopolis is a very important success for the Russians, who will now be able to construct a permanent bridge by which their troops can cross over, as the construction at Simnitza is far from perfect, and is constantly breaking down.

This important success, however, has been somewhat thrown into the shade by the apparent ease with which a small force of Russians have succeeded in crossing a pass of the Balkans. The Grand Duke Nicholas has now firmly established his head-quarters at Tirnova, where, on the 12th inst., he was received most enthusiastically by the inhabitants. From this town—the ancient Bulgarian capital—there are roads leading to several of the chief passes of the Balkans, and notably those known as the Shipka, the Travna, the Hain Boghaz, the Elena, and the Demir Kapou or Iron Gate passes. The first accounts of the crossing of the Balkans by the Russians were somewhat confusing, for at first they were reported to have mastered the Shipka Pass to the extreme right of Tirnova—a highly important position, and then to have forced the Iron Gate Pass to the extreme left of Tirnova—which according to Von Moltke is one of the most difficult of all the passes. Where the Russians really crossed was at Hain Bogaz, a small pass, merely a mule track, some 4,000 feet high, between the Travna and Elena passes, and a little to the south-east of Tirnova. There General Gourko, with an advance guard of Cossacks and dragoons, appears, on Saturday, the 14th inst., to have surprised the small Turkish force which was posted there, and to have gained possession of the pass. Next day General Gourko advanced still further, and fought another engagement near Arzazare, during which Raouf Pasha, coming up with a strong reinforcement, and—according to Turkish accounts and that of the Daily Telegraph correspondent—compelled him to retire with loss, not, however, before a detachment of Cossacks had appeared at Yeni Zagra—a station on the Jamboli-Adrianople railway—and had created a terrible panic amongst the inhabitants and officials of the district. According, however, to later and more independent accounts, General Gourko, by a clever manœuvre, circumvented the Turks, passed the Balkans, and is marching upon Kazanlik, a town at the Roumelian end of the Shipka Pass, in order to take that important position in the rear. Raouf Pasha, however, now daily hopes to be reinforced by Suleiman Pasha with 20,000 men from Montenegro, so that an important battle may be shortly expected, in which the Russians, unless heavily reinforced, will be, numerically speaking, at a great disadvantage.

The news that the Russians had so easily succeeded in crossing the Balkans has had a very dispiriting effect upon the Turks, more especially as their troops seem nowhere to be opposing any really efficient resistance to the Russian advance. Various reasons are stated for this inactivity, ranging from the supposition that it is part of a deeply-laid plan by which the Russians will be cut off in the rear by and by, to rumours that Russian gold is blinding the eyes of the Turkish commanders, and that the Turks while holding their troops in important positions allow the Russians to advance in order to induce some other European Power to come to their assistance. Be this as it may, the Russians, following the German tactics, are leaving troops to watch each fortified place, but are pushing forwards towards the capital with their main body with a boldness and audacity which would cost them dear did the Turkish commanders possess any average military skill or energy. As it is, the Russians are making good their advance throughout the line of the Dobrudscha as well as in Bulgaria, and it is stated that Kustendjie, abandoned by the Turks, is now in Russian occupation. As the Russians occupy each place they replace the Mussulman officials by Christians, though as a rule they find but few Mussulmans to replace, so great is the dread of the Muscovite inspired by the reports of the terrible cruelties committed by the Cossacks and the armed Bulgarians. The Turkish Government have published circumstantial accounts of the most sickening atrocities and massacres of women and children committed by the Russians, and one, the complete massacre of a long train of some 300 fugitives from the village of Heibeli, is corroborated by a correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, who testifies to have seen twenty-one of the victims who had escaped, women with lance thrusts and sword cuts, and children of both sexes wounded in the most frightful manner. According to the accounts he heard, the Cossacks, becoming tired of backing the fugitives, brought up some field guns and literally mowed the poor wretches down. We mention this incident, as it is vouched for by an English correspondent—the horrors detailed by the Turkish Government we do not quote, as we can scarcely believe that even the Russian soldiery can be guilty of such fiendish acts which, if true, would throw even the Batak and Tartar-Bazardjik outrages into the shade. That the Russian soldiers are not wholly saints is manifest by Mr. Forbes' letter in Tuesday's Daily News, where he details a scene of pillage by the Russian soldiery at Sistova, witnessed by Mr. Villiers, our own artist, who sleeping the night in an inhabitant's house, was roused by some soldiery, who having broken into the cellar had opened and imbibed bottles of vitriol in mistake for spirits, and maddened with pain were trying to force the unfortunate master of the house to swallow the "devil's drink" which they declared he had placed to poison them. Our artist ran great risk at their hands, but finally, seeing the hopeless pillage which was going on, went to the General in command, who sent down a detachment of troops to arrest the malefactors, who were at once imprisoned. The Russian officers had done what they were able to stop the outrages, but for once the Russian soldiery had shown themselves wholly unamenable to discipline.

At Constantinople the successful advance of the Russians is causing great alarm, and a proclamation from the Sultan calls upon all the citizens, Mussulman and Christians alike, to form a volunteer corps to defend their country. There are various rumours of peace, and the German Chargé d'Affaires is said to have gone to the Balkans on a "special mission." There is little doubt here that the Sultan would now only be too thankful for any attempt at mediation. In the meantime the Sultan has changed his Foreign Minister, Safvet Pasha having resigned and being replaced by Aarifi Pasha, Savfet receiving the portfolio of Public Works.

From Asia there is little news save that the siege of Kars has now been definitively raised, and that the Russians have retreated across the border except at Bayazid, which General Tergukassoff has succeeded in relieving. The Turks are now said to be preparing to carry the war into Russian territory.

To return to Europe, Roumania is definitively preparing to cross the Danube, and General Manu with 20,000 men will probably now make the passage between Turnu Marelles, and Nikopolis. Servia is quiet, but Montenegro, whence all the Turkish troops have been withdrawn for the defence of the Balkans, is again preparing to assume the offensive.

France.——The ill feeling between the Monarchists and Bonapartists continues unchecked, and threatens seriously to embarrass the Government, which is exhorting them to unity, and has administered a snub to the Bonapartists by disowning as its candidate M. Tristan Lambert, who announced himself to the Fontainebleau electors as a staunch MacMahonist, but at the same time declared his intention of after 1880 doing his utmost to procure an Imperial restoration. The Monarchists were naturally at once up in arms at such language, and the Cabinet immediately telegraphed to the Prefects that "the patronage of the Government can only be accorded to those candidates whose addresses do not deviate from the policy of conciliation and union amongst all sections of the Conservative party." Not that the Monarchists can claim to be very much better than the Bonapartists, as it is said that each candidate they support has to pass a pretty strict examination as to his orthodox views with regard to Mother Church. In the mean time it is rumoured that the elections will probably take place on October 14th, and the Cabinet as the time approaches is growing more tyrannical, and organising yet more arbitrary measures for the restriction of free thought and discussion respecting electoral matters. That the Working Men's Congress should be prohibited might have been expected; but even provincial schoolmasters are forbidden to meet, as is their custom, to discuss educational matters; while municipal councils are being suppressed; mayors dismissed, amongst the latter M. Huguet, the Mayor of Boulogne, and a life senator; café keepers are threatened with being compelled to close if they do not send a daily report of their customers' sayings to the police; and on Tuesday M. Fourtou suddenly dismissed M. Mimerel, who has filled the post of Counsel to the Ministry of the Interior for the last thirty years. The reason was that he had taken part with the Jurisconsults of the Republican party who have been holding an inquiry into the legality of the acts of the Prefects, such as revoking hawkers' licenses, forbidding the sale of papers, closing newsvendors' shops, &c. Indeed, the Liberals in some cases are taking legal steps to check the action of the Prefects, which they assert is now not sanctioned by the law. With regard to the newspapers, the Provinces are becoming denuded of all but Conservative journals, and even these are subject to scrutiny, so that M. de Cassagnac is in a terrible rage because the Pays has been interdicted at the Beauvais Railway Station. He threatens to begin a campaign against the Duc Decazes and the Orleanists, as "he cannot tolerate his paper being classed with those of Gambetta, Rochefort, and Simon.

Paris, like London, is suffering from cold and stormy weather, and socially speaking is eminently dull.—Saturday was the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille, but was celebrated by the Radicals with politic and praiseworthy quietude. Sunday, the fête day of the Comte de Chambord, was equally tranquilly commemorated by the Legitimists, the chief feature being an address of loyalty to the "King," published by the Union. Marshal MacMahon is preparing for a tour through the central provinces, including Bourges and Orleans, and will probably start on the 28th inst.; while his rival, M. Thiers, who on Saturday received a visit from Lord Lyons, is going to Dieppe.—The Radical and the Bien Public have each been fined 40*l.* for publishing the letter to the station-masters of the Lyons Railway, instructing them what to do in case of mobilisation; and M. Gambetta's paper, the République Française, is to be prosecuted for a letter attacking Marshal MacMahon.—There is little stirring in theatrical circles beyond the fact that M. Lamoureux is going to succeed M. Deldevez as leader of the orchestra at the Opera, that the Perle du Brésil is to be revived at the Opéra Comique, and that the well-known septuagenarian jeune premier actor, M. Laferriere, is dead.

Germany.——Baron Ketteler, the well-known Bishop of Mayence, is dead. He was one of the most energetic leaders of the Ultramontane party, to whom, in their campaign against the State, he will be a great loss.

The so-called Colorado beetle which appeared near Vlotho is now officially stated not to have been that dreaded insect; but according to The Times, the Colorado beetle has been imported by American vessels into German harbours, and all ships from across the Atlantic will now be carefully inspected. Placards containing life-size coloured portraits of the beetle are to be circulated throughout the country—a measure our own Government would do well to follow.

India.——Yakoob Beg, the well-known Attalik Ghazi and Emir of Kashgar, with whom we have so long been conducting intricate and difficult negotiations, has died at Kouralis. His death just now has special importance when taken together with the Chinese invasion of his territory, and the fact that he appointed his Lieutenant, Hakim Khan Tourah, as his successor, instead of one of his sons. The former, however, is said to have declined the dangerous honour, and Yakoob's eldest son, Kuli Beg, is now the reigning Emir. Yakoob's death will probably have the effect of hurrying on the Chinese invasion, an event on which many Anglo-Indians look with complacency, as they consider that an Empire such as China will prove a more trustworthy buffer to Russian invasion than a small state like Kashgar.

The Famine reports are not so favourable this week, the accounts from Madras being somewhat worse, as the rainfall has not been so bountiful as had been hoped. Indeed, unless rain falls, there will be grave reason for apprehension in Southern India.—The amounts and tenders for the new loan of two and a-half millions have been below expectation.—According to the Times of India, all the arrangements for sending a force of 40,000 men to Egypt in case of necessity had been satisfactorily settled on paper at least at Simla.

United States.——The general reduction of the 10 per cent. in the wages of railway operatives has not, as might have been expected, been received everywhere with perfect equanimity, and on the Ohio and Baltimore Railway in West Virginia there have been strikes and serious disturbances, the strikers obtaining possession of the trains, and refusing to send them on. A body of militia were despatched against them, but the soldiers showed too much sympathy with rioters to produce any effect, and the Governor has asked the President for Federal troops.

Canada.——There have been serious Orange riots at Montreal, where, although the Orangemen decided not to have a procession on the 12th, they attended service at church, and on coming out were attacked by a body of roughs, who killed an Orangeman in the mêlée. The Orangemen at once determined to make the funeral of their colleague an excuse for a demonstration. This took place on Wednesday, and owing to the presence of troops all passed off quietly until the evening, when some Orangemen returning home were attacked, one being shot dead and another dangerously wounded. The police then interfered, and protected the remainder from further violence.

THE COURT

The Queen has now gone to the Isle of Wight for her usual autumn visit. Before leaving Windsor Castle Her Majesty gave a succession of dinner parties, and entertained the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne on a visit. On Saturday the Queen gave audience to the Lord Chancellor, the Princess Louise and her husband left the Castle for town, and in the evening Prince and Princess Christian, Lady Abercrombie, the Duchess of Roxburghe, Lady Susan Melville, the Lord Chancellor, Lieut.-Col. Sir H. Elphinstone, Lord de Ros, and Mr. Theodore Martin dined with Her Majesty. Next day the Queen, the Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended morning service in the private chapel, and Lady Churchill and the Misses Lambart joined the Royal party at dinner. On Monday the Princess Louise lunched with Her Majesty, and the Russian Ambassadress was presented to the Queen by Lady Derby. In the evening Her Majesty gave a dinner party, at which the Duchess of Wellington, Lord and Lady Skelmersdale, Lieut.-Gen. Sir Lintorn Simmons, and Rear-Admiral Sir E. Commerell were the principal guests. During dinner the band of the Grenadier Guards played in the quadrangle. The Queen gave an audience to Lord Beaconsfield on Tuesday, and Her Majesty's visitors left the Castle. On Thursday morning, the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold would leave Windsor for Gosport, crossing the Solent in the Royal yacht, and arriving at Osborne to luncheon.—The Queen has expressed her satisfaction with the review in Windsor Park last week.

The Prince and Princess of Wales visited Wantage on Saturday. They were received at the station by Col. Loyd Lindsay, and were escorted to the market-place, where an address was presented and replied to, the Prince unveiled the statue, a bouquet was offered to the Princess, and after the Prince and Princess had each planted a lime-tree in commemoration of their visit the Royal party adjourned to Lockinge Park. Here Colonel and Mrs. Lindsay were to have given a garden-party, but the rain was too heavy, so the visitors were entertained in a pavilion and dined in the house. The Prince and Princess remained at Lockinge Park until Monday, when they returned to Marlborough House, and in the evening went to a ball given by Lord and Lady Suffield. On Wednesday the Prince and Princess dined with the Duke of Cambridge. Yesterday (Friday) the Prince would preside at a meeting of the Commissioners for the 1851 Exhibition, when a deputation of representatives from about sixty of the leading towns of Great Britain would attend to ask for funds from the Commissioners towards the promotion of Science and Art in the provinces. To-day (Saturday) the Prince and Princess will be present at Lady Holland's garden-party.—Prince Albert Victor of Wales is suffering from a slight attack of fever, but his illness is not so serious as to cause anxiety.—The Prince of Wales has presented his portrait to the officers of the Thunderer in remembrance of his recent visit to that vessel.

The Princess Louise on Saturday evening distributed the prizes to the successful competitors in the Clerkenwell Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition at Holford Square, the Marquis of Lorne remarking that he had never seen a better show.

CHURCH NEWS

Mr. Tooth Again.——The correspondence between his Grace of Canterbury and the recalcitrant Vicar of Hatcham shows clearly enough the uselessness of any attempt to reconcile the ultra-Ritualists to the Church. Taking advantage of the interregnum in that portion of the Diocese of Rochester which made him acting Diocesan for the time being, the Primate tried to persuade Mr. Tooth to obey the "living voice of the Church." Mr. Tooth, however, was not to be mollified; he will not yield even an inch. With an obstinate and egotistical presumption of infallibility he claims the right to reject the Resolutions of Convocation because they are not "Synodical Acts," although he knows full well that no Synodical Act can now be made without that very interference of the State against which he so vehemently protests. When his appeal comes on for hearing he may possibly gain a technical victory like that achieved by the Rev. T. P. Dale, but the final result is none the less inevitable because it is for a while deferred.

The Prestbury Ritual Case.——On Thursday Lord Penzance gave his decision in this case, which was instituted against the Rev. J. Edwards, of Prestbury, near Cheltenham, before the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Act. After being part heard it was stood over until after judgment in the Ridsdale case, and when it came on again on the 18th ult. Dr. Deane, counsel for the prosecution, suggested that instead of a formal monition being issued the Rev. J. Edwards should simply be ordered to discontinue the practices complained of. This request has now been granted so far as the vestments are concerned, but with regard to the crucifix, the objection that there was no proof of its being bowed to or reverenced was held to be fatal, Lord Penzance remarking that the proper course would have been to apply for a faculty for its removal. The defendant has given notice of appeal to the Judicial Committee.

Various.——The Rev. Rowley Hill, Vicar of Sheffield, has been chosen to fill the vacant Bishopric of Sodor and Man.—The Primate has written to the Council of the Church Association, expressing sympathy with the natural and legitimate anxiety they exhibit to promote a loyal obedience to the decisions of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but declining to receive a deputation on the subject, on the ground that it is wiser for those in authority to refrain from discussions which are apt to become desultory, and to show their intentions only by their formal acts and utterances.—"The Confessional" continues to be the subject of much conversation and correspondence. It is said that a number of wives and mothers who themselves go to confession are getting up a petition to the Queen upon the subject, and that another document expressing sympathy with the Holy Cross Society is in course of signature by laymen only. On the other hand, a petition to the Archbishops and Bishops, calling upon them to take immediate steps for putting down the practice of confession in the Church of England, and for preventing the members of the "Holy Cross" Society from promulgating the doctrines denounced by Lord Redesdale, is in preparation.—The Bishop of Worcester, speaking at a meeting last week, said that further experience had fully confirmed the opinion which he had expressed in 1874—"that the systematic use of confession and absolution in private is calculated to move, more than any other practice which was deliberately laid aside by the Reformers, the aversion and the indignation of the people of this country."—On Wednesday, the Rev. Canon Thorold, who is soon to be consecrated Bishop of Rochester, presided for the last time over the vestry of St. Pancras. A congratulatory resolution was adopted, and Dr. Thorold in returning thanks said that he was going out of a peaceful harbour into a wild and angry sea, but they might rely upon it that he would do his best in his new position to maintain the true faith of Christ and His Church.—The Wesleyan Conference is announced to commence at Bristol on Wednesday next, and much discussion is anticipated on the subject of lay representation. The candidates for the presidential chair are the Rev. S. Coley, Dr. Rigg, and Dr. Pope.

MUSIC

Royal Italian Opera.——By the production of Otto Nicolai's Lustigen Weiber von Windsor on Saturday night Mr. Gye has fully redeemed the pledges contained in his prospectus. Three operas, out of five specified, were to be given, and the favourite work of the Königsberg musician completed the promised number. Ten years have elapsed since it was last played here at Her Majesty's Theatre, where it was brought out in an Italian adaptation under the name of Falstaff. Both the libretto of Mosenthal and the music of Nicolai, however, are known well enough to render a detailed account of either superfluous. Although the first act of Shakespeare's comedy is overlooked, and several characters are omitted, the plot in the main is followed out with tolerable closeness. The music, if not very original, is tuneful, pleasing, and characteristic throughout, besides everywhere showing a practised hand. The overture is especially good, and its brilliant execution by the orchestra, under the direction of Signor Bevignani, obtained a general encore. The cast of the dramatis personæ at Covent Garden is for the most part excellent. Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg has seldom afforded more complete satisfaction than in the character of Mrs. Ford, which she acts and sings to perfection. Madame Scalchi, too, is excellent as Mrs. Page; while Anne Page could hardly be better represented than by Mdlle. Bianchi. The other parts are all more or less efficiently sustained, best of all being the Mr. Ford of the new baritone, Signor Pandolfini, which at Her Majesty's Theatre used to be allotted to Mr. Santley. The Falstaff of Signor Capponi only wants a dash of humour to make it thoroughly acceptable. The opera is placed upon the stage with appropriate scenery and appointments, and, to judge by the applause, the revival was unanimously approved. The second performance of Le Vispe Comari di Windsor (such is the Italian title adopted at the Royal Italian Opera), given on Tuesday for the "benefit" of Mdlle. Thalberg, was received with equal favour. On Monday Madame Adelina Patti repeated her admirable impersonation of Violetta in the Traviata; and on Thursday, for her "benefit," Madame Patti was to appear as the heroine in Gounod's Faust e Margherita. The opera selected for Mdlle. Albani's benefit was Lucia di Lammermoor. To the one performance of M. Ambroise Thomas' Hamlet we shall refer next week in some brief remarks upon the season, which comes to an end this evening with Verdi's Aïda, Madame Patti and Signor Nicolini supporting the chief characters.

Her Majesty's Theatre.——The Puritani of Bellini was represented on Tuesday in order to give Madame Ethelka Gerster an opportunity of appearing in a third character. Both dramatically and musically the part of Elvira helps to exhibit her best qualities in a more favourable light than either Amina or Lucia. Availing herself of every opportunity to display her higher notes to advantage, she never fails to evoke loud applause. She was especially successful in the polacca, "Son vergin vezzosa," at the close of which she takes B, C sharp, and D in alt. with the greatest ease; and in the cabaletta, "Vien diletto," the sequel to "Quila voce." The voice of Signor Fancelli is somewhat too ponderous for the music of Arturo, but he sings parts of it with fine expression, more especially the duet with Elvira in the final act. Signor Rota is an excellent Riccardo, and Herr Rokitansky an intelligent if somewhat heavy Giorgio. The once famous duet, "Suoni la tromba"—which Rossini, writing from Paris an account of the first performance of I Puritani, number by number, to a friend at Bologna, dismissed curtly, with the observation, "I need not say anything about the duet for basses, you must have heard it"—did not create the ancient impression. Nor are we of opinion that this last of Bellini's operas can ever, under any circumstances, be restored to the popularity it formerly enjoyed. Lohengrin was repeated on Saturday, with Madame Nilsson's superlative performance of Elsa, which must ever lend it a powerful attraction. We have also had repetitions of Don Giovanni, Faust ("benefit" of M. Faure), and Lucia. To-night Puritani is to be given for the second time; for Monday ("benefit" of Signor Tamberlik), we are promised Otello; and on Saturday next the season terminates.

Waifs.——Mdlle. Titiens has abandoned all idea of coming to London for the present.—Mr. Carl Rosa has engaged Mr. Charles Adams as the principal tenor of his operatic company. The operas which Mr. Rosa intends to add to his repertory this year are Oberon, Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, and Professor Macfarren's Robin Hood.—The Christine Nilsson and Parepa Rosa prizes were competed for at the Royal Academy of Music on Saturday. The successful candidates for the first were Misses Mary Davies and Marian Williams; the second was awarded to Mr. James Sauvage. On Monday the Lucas and Sterndale Bennett prizes were contended for, the first being awarded to Mr. R. Harvey Lohr, the second to Miss Nancy Evans. The prizes are to be distributed to the successful competitors by Madame Sainton Dolby.—Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg leaves London for Barcelona to-day.—The Abbé Liszt has recently paid a flying visit to Berlin, where he was courteously received by the Crown Prince.—Signor Bozzetti has been commissioned by the Santa Cecilia Academy at Rome to compose a Requiem for the anniversary of the death of Charles Albert, father of Victor Emmanuel.—In Flotow's new opera, Die Musikanten, the leading character is Mozart, the great composer.—Notwithstanding all prognostications to the contrary, there is to be an Italian opera this autumn and winter, both at St. Petersburg and Moscow. Nilsson, Albani, and many other artists are already engaged.

THEATRES

The custom of producing new pieces by unknown authors at special morning performances has its disadvantages, but on the whole it is one that ought not to be discouraged. It is true that plays which make their first appearance in this way are rarely put upon the stage with due care. No manager is willing to expend money upon a piece brought out in this timid tentative fashion; and, worse still, the performers are apt to neglect the study of parts in which they are well aware that they will in all probability be only called upon to appear on one occasion. Besides this, there is an inevitable foreboding of disaster in these morning first performances which has a depressing effect. That the management do not believe in the attraction of the play is confessed, for if they did it is clear that in these days of dearth of dramatic talent they would hasten to bring it out in the regular way of their evening performances. In brief, a piece produced at a morning performance is understood to be one in which hardly anybody has confidence, and one which is only brought out to soothe the vanity of the author, or at best in the faintest possible hope that the distrust of the management may prove to have been unfounded. On the other hand, it is to be remembered that it has been abundantly shown that even experienced managers are occasionally greatly mistaken as to the value of an unacted piece; that the best test, after all, of the acting qualities of a play is to act it before a genuine audience; and that even a feeble representation ought not entirely to conceal the merits of a really good work from the eyes of the critical. But the best apology for these experimental performances is to be found in the fact that whatever their drawbacks they furnish the unacted with an opportunity of a practical trial—such as it is, and that but for this it would be much more difficult for an untried and unknown author to obtain a chance of appealing to the public. Certain it is that the merits of more than one new play have been made manifest in this way; though, unhappily, it must be confessed that as a rule the result has been to reveal only too much justification for the managerial misgivings. We regret to be obliged to place in this latter category a new comedy entitled Flirtation, brought out at the Globe Theatre on Saturday morning last. Flirtation, which is in four acts, is destitute alike of ingenuity of design or of creative power. Generally its subject matter is confined to the practical jokes and foolish hoaxes of two young ladies, and the counter jokes and equally foolish hoaxes of two young gentlemen. An old military beau of incredible silliness and gullibility is also represented as a victim of the playfulness of these young persons, who giggle and gasp a great deal at his expense. In making nearly every one of the personages say impertinent things to all the others in turn the authors are only following a fashion of modern comedy; but nothing can excuse the coarseness of their dialogue. There are very possibly young men and young women who when they see a gentleman and lady in conversation are capable of exclaiming, "Put a cherry in her mouth, Major, and try whether you can take it out without kissing her;" but as people of decent feeling would certainly like to avoid their society off the stage there seems no reason why any one should sit to hear them in a comedy.

French performances in London are apt to depend upon the attraction of one or two good names, but this reproach cannot be applied to the performances at the Gaiety by the famous Vaudeville Company, who took possession of Mr. Hollingshead's stage on Monday last. With the exception of Mr. St. Germain, who cannot be spared, and of Madame Fargueil, for whom there is no part in Le Procès Veauradieux, the entire company may be said to be here; and save in the case of M. St. Germain, whose part of Fauvinard is taken by M. Dieudonné, MM. Delacour and Hennequin's amusing farcical comedy is represented by the original cast who secured for this piece so great and so enduring a popularity in Paris. The Great Divorce Case at the Criterion has already made the public familiar with the story of this extravagant but most entertaining production; but all who have a taste for French acting, and for humorous invention and wild but genuine fun, would do well to see this piece as acted by M. Parade, Mdlle. Massin, and their supporters.

The season of the Court theatre has been brought to a close, and Mr. Hare and his admirable company are away on a provincial tour.—The Prince of Wales's will also close in a few days, but Mrs. Bancroft and her husband intend to take a holiday.—All visitors to the theatre will rejoice to learn that Miss E. Farren is so far recovered from her serious illness as to be expected to take part in the next season of English performances at the Gaiety, commencing at the end of this month.—The Lyceum will close next Saturday. On the 30th inst. Mr. Irving will appear here in the character of Hamlet on the occasion of his benefit.

The Royal Polytechnic.——An entirely new and very interesting programme is now being presented at this ever-popular institution. Amongst the "new inventions" which have always been characteristic of the place is Mr. H. Page's "Human Arm Writer," by means of which messages in the handwriting of the sender are transmitted from one part of the building to another. Mr. J. L. King gives a most instructive lecture on the Russo-Turkish war, vividly illustrated by dioramic pictures, some of which are copied from sketches which have appeared in The Graphic and the Illustrated London News. In some instances very startling effects are produced by an ingenious mechanical arrangement which shows the blowing up of the Turkish ironclads or the bursting of shells in a besieged city. Professor Gardner has a new séance, in which he exhibits the marvels of ancient and modern "spiritism." The first and second parts of this might, we think, be abridged with advantage. The evening closes with the story of the "Sleeping Beauty," written by Ellis Reynolds, and read and sung by Mr. O. Buckland, and illustrated by means of dioramic scenes and tableaux vivants on the stage. On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays Professor E. V. Gardner substitutes for his "Séance of Mystery" his new lecture, entitled "Death in the Tumbler," in which the subject of Water and its Impurities is treated.

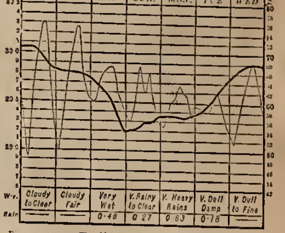
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

July 12th to July 18th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——The weather this week has been very unsettled and wet. On the morning of Thursday, the 12th instant, the barometer began to fall, and continued falling in the southern parts of England until eleven p.m. on Saturday, the 14th instant. By this time the centre of a small but rather deep depression had reached Dorsetshire, and travelling northwards was found over the Irish Sea by the following morning; here it remained till Monday night, the 16th instant, when it moved slowly to the eastward, reaching the North Sea off Scarborough by Tuesday morning, the 17th instant, whence it travelled slowly away in an east-north-easterly direction. Its rains were exceedingly heavy and general, and its winds fresh to strong in force. From Monday, the 16th instant, the barometer rose steadily till Wednesday, the 18th instant, when it turned, and was inclined to go down again. The barometer was highest (30·05 inches) on Thursday, the 12th instant; lowest (29·20 inches) on Monday, the 16th instant; range, 0·85 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (76°) on Thursday, the 12th instant, lowest (49°) on the same day; range, 27°. It has been on the whole several degrees lower this week than last, and very unsteady. Rainfall: The total fall was 1·74 inch, on four days; greatest fall, 0·83 inch, on Monday, the the 16th instant. On Thursday morning last the barometer was again falling slowly.

LEGAL

An Alleged Police Conspiracy.——On Thursday, last week an extraordinary charge was made at the Bow Street Police Court against Nathaniel Druscovitch, John Micklejohn, and William Palmer, three of the chief inspectors at Scotland Yard, for conspiring, with a solicitor named Froggatt, to defeat the ends of justice in the prosecution of the betting men who were recently convicted of swindling Madame de Goncourt. The case was not fully gone into, but Mr. Poland, who appeared for the Crown, said that secret inquiries had been going on for several months, and every care had been taken to have the clearest evidence before bringing such a serious charge.

"Drunk or Dying."——A strange story was told at a coroner's inquest held last Saturday in Whitechapel. The deceased was a book-hawker named Patrick Keirmann, and was well known to one of the witnesses, a Mr. Williams, who said that on the previous Wednesday he saw him suddenly struck with great violence by a strange man, who afterwards walked away. The deceased fell on the edge of the pavement, and was taken off to the station by the police as "drunk and incapable." Next morning he was removed to the hospital, where he died. The curious part of the case is that, although a post mortem examination revealed "a large bruise on the forehead, a serious contusion at the back of the head, and a fracture of the skull," the police who had him in charge "saw no marks of violence upon him." The jury returned an open verdict in accordance with the medical testimony, and we suppose that some endeavour will be made to find the person whose unprovoked assault seems to have been the primary cause of his death. In the mean time it would perhaps be as well if Colonel Henderson were to issue strict orders that all supposed drunken persons taken into custody should, in case of any reasonable doubt as to their condition, be immediately examined by a competent medical man. The expense might be met by increasing the fines for drunkenness.

Tichborniana.——Several items of news respecting the irrepressible Tichborne case have cropped up within the last few days. Mr. Cobbett has made another unsuccessful application to the High Court of Justice to have the verdict and sentence set aside; and it is reported that Mrs. Jury, who was sent out to Australia by the Claimant's friends, has returned without being able to recognise the lunatic at Paramatta as her brother, Arthur Orton. On the other hand, one of the Tichborne jury, Mr. C. Dunsby, has come somewhat tardily to the conclusion that he was wrong in agreeing to the verdict against the Claimant, and has written to the Queen asking for the immediate release of the defendant or the institution of fresh inquiries. To these on dit, must be added the letter just received by Mr. G. Onslow from a man named Duncan, until lately a convict at Dartmoor, who gives a sad account of the indignities and unjust punishment which he says are inflicted upon "Sir Roger" by the officials.

Miscellaneous Items.——Messrs. Swindlehurst and Saffery, who are accused of having conspired to defraud the shareholders of the Artizans' Dwellings' Company of 30,000*l.*, were again before the magistrates on Wednesday, when Dr. Baxter Langley, the Chairman of the Company, was associated with them in the charge, it being alleged that some of the money could be traced to his possession.—An engineer belonging to

THE NEW SALOON STEAMER "LORD OF THE ISLES," BUILT FOR THE NEW TOURIST ROUTE IN THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND FROM GREENOCK TO INVERARY

Her Majesty's ship Simoom, has been dismissed the service by court-martial, for the singular offence of stealing a parrot. The bird belonged to an Indian officer, and during the voyage home was taken from its cage in the cabin and subsequently found in the screw alley. As there were five hundred other parrots on board, the great point in dispute related to its identity, which, however, was held to be established by its extraordinary linguistic accomplishments.—The inquest on the victims of the recent bridge accident at Bath has resulted in a verdict of manslaughter against the four owners of the structure, and the toll-keeper, Tanner, who have all been committed for trial at the Assizes. Several actions for compensation have also been commenced, and an application to change the venue from Wells to Middlesex has been refused by the Justices of the Queen's Bench Division.—The other day a corpse was picked out of canal at Liverpool, and identified as that of one John Graham, a grocer of the town, who was accordingly declared by the jury to have been "found drowned." Next morning, however, the living John Graham called upon the coroner to explain that it was a case of mistaken identity, and that the dead man has not since been recognised.—A Metropolitan policeman has been fined 40*s.* for assaulting a watchman employed on the Thames Embankment. It seems that the constable found him sitting on a bench, and not believing his story as to his occupation, pulled him off, and in a rather rough fashion tried to persuade him to move on. Perhaps the simplest way to prevent a repetition of such a misunderstanding would be to supply these watchmen with some distinguishing badge or uniform by which they may be recognised.—The mutilated body of a woman has been found in the river Arran, near Dolgelly, North Wales. The remains are supposed to be those of a person named Sarah Hughes, who has been missing since the 4th ult., and much excitement has been created by the arrest of a farmer's son on suspicion of being her murderer.—Another Welsh woman, named Margaret Owen, has been missing since June 12, and the county authorities have offered 100*l.* for her discovery.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED

THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. E. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. PARKER. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace, it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 29 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

DR. LELIEVRE'S ICELAND MOSS POULTICE (Patented) is exempt from all the inconveniences inseparable from Poultices made with Linseed or Bread. MR. MECHI'S ADDRESS to his OLD FRIENDS and CUSTOMERS and to the PUBLIC:
"As it has been erroneously supposed by some that I am no longer interested in my London business, I think it desirable to state that I continue to carry it on as energetically, and I trust, as satisfactorily to the Public, as formerly, assisted by my only son, who will in due time succeed me. It is now 50 years ago since I first commenced business in Leadenhall Street, and what changes have taken place! Then everybody shaved, and my razor and razor strop trade was immense; now moustache and beard are the order of the day, and the razor and strop trade is comparatively defunct. Then there were no railways, so people stayed at home and used wooden dressing cases; now everybody travels by rail, and we have dressing-bags to suit the altered conditions. Fifty years ago the poor geese supplied our pens, and many a now rich merchant in the City will remember the quality of Mechi's shilling pen-knives; but steel pens have extinguished the pen knife trade and the penmaking machines, and the geese are in peace, except at Michaelmas. In fact, steam has altered, and, I may safely say, improved everything, and has made us a nation of travellers both by land and sea. I wonder how much time is now occupied in reading the steam-worked press? and how much less time is occupied in sipping port wine, as we used to do 50 years ago, when we could not travel? Steam will make our 4 lb. loaves cheaper some day, just as it has converted calico from 2s. 6d. to 6d. or less per yard. Then, again, a letter which used to cost 6s. 6d. to Cork is now carried for a penny. Sir Rowland Hill richly deserves a monument. But to return to business. 50 years ago, when I first commenced on a small scale, I made it an axiom that what I sold should be good and useful, and I believe thousands who used the Strop and Paste, which I personally invented, can testify to this; in fact, it was sometimes complained of that I stamped on my razors, 'Exchanged if not approved.' I have never, and shall never so long as I live, deviate from that principle, because it is the true means to retain and increase one's connection. I devoted my attention especially to the quality and convenience of arrangements in the Dressing Bag and Dressing Case Department, and in the tasteful selection of articles suitable for presentation, as well as on the matter of Dispatch Boxes and Writing Cases. Although both razors and penknives have 'gone out,' our sportsmen remain, and 'Sporting Knives' form one of our special departments. I feel firmly convinced that there is no fear of the departure of knives and forks, or dinners, so we make this an important department in quality and price. In conclusion, I ask no favours, but simply desire that my customers should compare the quality and price of my wares with those of other dependable establishments, and form their own conclusions. Most of my worthy assistants and workmen have been nearly forty years in my service, and long ago learned that civility and attention to our customers are as important as good quality in the articles sold. Illustrated catalogues will be forwarded post free on application."

THE WAR IN THE EAST—WITH THE RUSSIANS AT BIELA

Topics of the Week

English Policy in the East.——There is considerable discontent in the country with the policy of the Government, for nobody quite knows what their policy is. They have just sent 3,000 troops to Malta, and that looks as if they wished to be prepared for the defence of Gallipoli. But, in the first place, the force is not sufficient for that purpose; and, in the second, Lord Derby and Sir Stafford Northcote did their utmost to give the one decisive act of the Cabinet the appearance of an act which is without significance. What does it all mean? Are we going to prevent the Russians from taking Constantinople? Are the Straits to be kept closed? Or are we to stand aside, and not only let Turkey be broken to pieces, but allow Russia to make what new arrangements she chooses? These are the questions which are everywhere being anxiously asked, and the Government give no response. We believe this to be a profound mistake. England would submit to one policy or the other, for much can be said for both, but she does not wish to adopt a middle course, at one moment seeming very bold and at the next timidly drawing back. There is one theory which would give a certain consistency to the action of the Ministry, and that is that they have made up their mind to submit to the opening of the Straits, and possibly to the seizure of Constantinople by Russia, but intend to make sure of the only possible compensation—Egypt. This sounds very wicked in the ears of a certain class of publicists; but assuredly, if Constantinople goes, Egypt must practically become English. That is, if we intend to keep India; and on that point, we hope, there is no dispute. The sun of England will indeed have set when she admits even the possibility of being driven from that Eastern Dependency to which she has, with so much success, transferred the ideas and institutions of Western civilisation.

Free-Trade and War.——Mr. Bright's speculations on the pacific tendency of Free Trade doctrines form in our view the most interesting portion of his recent speeches at Bradford. He says frankly that he may be regarded as a dreamer, but inasmuch as we all—all Englishmen at any rate—profess to love peace and to detest war, it is well that men of eminence should dream such dreams, for then they influence other minds, and so become more capable of ultimate realisation. There can be no doubt that the altered commercial relations between England and France during the last twenty years tend much to support Mr. Bright's view. Even the very limited freedom of trade which exists between the two countries—the restrictions, be it observed, are all on the side of France—have made war between these once traditional foes a far more unlikely contingency than it formerly was. Not only does close commercial intercourse create multitudinous pecuniary interests which would suffer if war were declared, but it establishes bonds of personal friendship. Thousands of Frenchmen, who would formerly never have dreamt of visiting our foggy island, now come over here to transact business; they see John Bull in the flesh, and they find he is a much better fellow than the perfidious being depicted in historical annals. Hence they are less inclined to go to war with him on small provocation. The late Emperor of the French fully deserves all the eulogy which Mr. Bright bestowed upon him for having in the matter of Free Trade been so far in advance of the mass of his countrymen; and we can afford to unite in this praise of him all the more ungrudgingly because in some other respects his character was far from admirable. It would appear that in other countries as well as France the impulse towards Free Trade doctrines must come from above rather than from below. The example of England is apt to be somewhat misleading, because the chief protected article, corn, was supposed to be a monopoly of the territorial aristocracy. Hence landlords were Protectionists and workmen Free Traders. Elsewhere the positions are reversed, and accordingly the most Republican communities, where the workman is politically supreme, such as the United States, Canada, and Australia, are the most strenuously wedded to Protection. If Mr. Bright can only persuade the working classes all over the world that the Custom House tends to lower wages and lessen employment he will be in a fair way to realise his cherished dream of universal disarmament.

The Civil War in America.——"Civil War" is hardly too large a name for the extraordinary conflict now going on in the United States. We have seen many strikes in this country; but anything remotely resembling the strike of the American railway servants we have never experienced. The traffic of a very large part of the vast Continent is stopped; there have been deeds of violence and bloodshed; and the excitement becomes daily more dangerous. The difficulties of putting down the movement are enormous, for it is uncertain how far the agitators have the sympathy of the working classes and the militia. Some alarmists even maintain that now at last we are in presence of the struggle between Capital and Labour, which has long been predicted as certain to come in the end. Neither State Governments nor the Federal Government have large bodies of troops at their command; and if they had it would be impossible, with the railways in the possession of the insurgents, to send the men to all the points at which they may be needed. Europe watches with extreme anxiety the progress of the conflict, for many of the causes which have led to it are also at work on this side of the Atlantic. In America, however, there is a special reason for the vehemence of feeling which is being displayed. As we have before pointed out, the employers and the employed are for the most part men of diverse origin; they have an instinctive mutual dislike, and each resents every advantage claimed by the other. It must be added that railway companies in America are so unscrupulous in exaggerating their profits that the workmen naturally expect a rise of wages. When, instead of obtaining this, they find themselves worse off than ever their disappointment is proportionately intense. It is to be hoped that when the present trouble has been overcome directors will be convinced that honest statements are, after all, those which are attended by the least disagreeable consequences.

London Below Bridge.——Year by year the vast aggregation of buildings which we generically call London grows vaster, and year by year the isolation caused by the absence of bridges between the Middlesex and Surrey sides of the below-bridge portions of the Metropolis becomes a more serious inconvenience. These vast hives of population, which in themselves would form two respectably-sized capitals for a couple of second-class nations, are practically nearly as much prevented from communicating with each other by the broad river as if a steep mountainous ridge were interposed between them. Had the majority of the inhabitants been wealthy or even well-to-do their complaints would have long since been heard, but as the great bulk of them are labouring people they have been suffered to content themselves with the limited intercourse derived from ferry-boats, or from the circuitous journey across London Bridge. Merchandise and vehicles were necessarily compelled to seek this latter route, and consequently London Bridge has for long had to bear far more than its fair burden of traffic, and hence "blocks" and stoppages are of constant occurrence. Bearing in mind these considerations we regret to observe that the Common Council have decided—in opposition to the resolution they arrived at last year—to apply a mere palliative in place of a permanent remedy for the inconveniences complained of. The plan of widening London Bridge has once more been revived, an objectionable undertaking both from an engineering and an ornamental point of view, and one moreover which will afford little relief to the traffic unless the approaches to the bridge are also widened. As, however, the City authorities will have to apply to Parliament for power to raise the necessary funds it is possible the project may be vetoed, and then it will be advisable to consider the far more serviceable scheme of an entirely new thoroughfare across the river lower down. This may take the form of a high-level bridge, a subway, or a low-level bridge. Both the two former are costly, and necessitate steep approaches, while the latter will require to be opened at intervals—thereby suspending the traffic—to allow ships to pass. To the East Londoners, after the privations they have endured, any means of communication will be a boon, and a bridge which is closed now and then will be far preferable to no bridge at all.

The Irish Obstructives.——The Chancellor of the Exchequer undoubtedly acted somewhat hastily in the course he adopted on Wednesday in regard to the obstruction offered to the progress of public business. Mr. Parnell more than deserved all the hard things said of him, but in the particular words taken down he was quite within his right. It would be impossible to say that members shall never be allowed to express "satisfaction" or "interest" in "preventing and thwarting the intentions of the Government." Much of the best work done in Parliament has been done in vehement opposition to the Ministry of the day; and it may be the absolute duty of individual members to strain to the utmost the forms of the House in special cases. Sir Stafford Northcote evidently admitted the force of this argument in insisting that the words were to be taken in connection with the whole of Mr. Parnell's recent conduct. Whatever may be thought of the manner in which the question has been raised, it was high time it should be seriously considered. There is an obvious conspiracy on the part of a few foolish men to nullify as far as they can the labours of the national representatives; and it is now proved that the conspiracy may result in a vast amount of mischief. Mr. Biggar is quite capable of reading blue books by the hour in connection with any subject that may be before the House; and Mr. O'Donnell, of whom better things might have been hoped, will oppose any proposal for any length of time by arguments as applicable to a journey to the moon as to the question he nominally discusses. These tactics have apparently given much enjoyment to the gentlemen who have had recourse to them. We should not be surprised if they were thought witty as well as wise by some ardent patriots. But Parliament clearly could not permanently allow the time of the nation to be thus wasted. Its rules were framed on the assumption that they would be applied by men of the world and gentlemen. Now that we know that they can be persistently abused, it is absolutely necessary they should be modified.

Lunatics on their Travels.——Besides the external perils which are inseparable from railway travelling, there are internal risks, arising chiefly from objectionable companionship, which to many persons appear even more formidable. So long as we cling to our system of separate compartments some of these unpleasantnesses cannot be altogether got rid of. The most vigilant railway officials cannot always detect drunken people, because the liquor they have swallowed may not begin to show its effects till they have been some time in the train; nor is it possible to distinguish by any outward mark those cowardly fellows who insult and annoy solitary women. Again, a man may, without the knowledge of his friends and acquaintance, be on the verge of a paroxysm of raving madness, and yet, as he shows no external sign of it, may gain admission to a railway carriage. But when a man is known to be mad, the most thorough precautions ought to be taken against possible mischief before suffering him to travel. Inside a lunatic asylum, where bolts and bars abound, and where there is always at hand a strong staff of skilled attendants, it may be prudent to dispense with instruments of restraint; but when a madman has to be carried in public conveyances he ought, for the security of his fellow-passengers, to be handcuffed in all cases where there is any possibility of violence to be apprehended. Humanitarians may cry out against this proposal, but it is warranted by facts. Most of our readers will remember a horrible case near Liverpool, when an inoffensive traveller had his thumb bitten off by a maniac; and now a workhouse master, conveying a pauper lunatic from Glasgow to London, has been grievously wounded by him. Extraordinary carelessness was exhibited in this last case, as the madman, who could not have been properly searched, had managed to secrete a razor in his pocket. It would be well if, as is we believe the custom on French railways, specially constructed vans were used for the conveyance of criminals and insane persons; and, in the case of pauper lunatics, instead of carrying them to and fro about the country, to the risk both of keepers and passengers, it would be much more sensible to keep them where they are, and let their legal place of settlement pay the charge for their maintenance.

Confederation in South Africa.——Serious opposition will evidently be offered to the South Africa Bill, but we hope even at this late period of the Session the Government will be able to carry it. We could understand the objections urged against it if the Government proposed to force Confederation on the Colonies. A compulsory measure could only lead to discontent and disaster. But all the Government propose to do is to give the Colonies the opportunity of combining if they choose. And there are very strong reasons why, notwithstanding certain local prejudices against Confederation, it should be heartily encouraged. The individual States will never be quite safe from the invasion of lawless native tribes until all together are able to present to them a united front; and so long as the present divisions last the commercial relations of the colonies cannot be developed to their utmost possible extent. It is objected that perhaps only two of the colonies may take advantage of the powers granted them; but even that would be a step in the right direction, and we believe it would be soon followed by a complete scheme of union. No one wishes to hamper the free inward growth of the colonies; all that is wanted is to put them in a position in which their common interests shall be adequately studied. The only real difficulty in the case arises from the relations of the whites and blacks. It is impossible to say that the latter shall receive the same political rights as the former, for in Natal, for instance, that would be to hand over all power to savages. The circumstances of each State in this matter differ from those of all the others; and to each must be left to some extent the determination of the question. We can only insist that there shall be no slavery, that the blacks shall be enabled to acquire land, and that in the various Legislatures they shall be at least indirectly represented. These were the points to which Mr. Forster wisely confined himself; and all of them may be secured by reserving to the Imperial Government the power of veto in the case of every measure by which the rights of the coloured population are affected.

SOUTHERN INDIA.——Crops do not mature and ripen in a day, and a month ago, although the rains in the Madras Presidency were falling copiously, and all promised well for the coming season, it was shown by those competent to judge that a period of several months must elapse before the rice planted this year would become available for consumption, and that during that time the famine-stricken population would still stand in need of extraneous support. Since then, however, the situation has changed greatly for the worse:—the rain has almost ceased to fall in the famine districts, and unless it should recommence falling within a few days the probability is that Madras and Mysore are destined to a second year of scarcity. Those whose farming experiences have been confined to this country can scarcely appreciate the Indian demand for rain. Here we far more often suffer from excess of moisture than from drought, and even if drought does come its effects are usually beneficial rather than hurtful to our cereal crops, especially to wheat. Rice, the great cereal staple of the East, is altogether of a different temperament, moisture is its native element, it spends, or ought to spend, the greater part of its days up to its knees in water, and so drought simply means destruction as far as rice is concerned. As for future prospects, if Southern India is condemned to a second year of dearth, it is to be hoped that the Government will act generously, and not adopt the niggardly tactics of the Highland economist, who so nearly succeeded (had not the poor brute died) in feeding his horse on a straw a day. We speak thus, because the Relief Camp statistics indicate a frightful rate of mortality. This is, no doubt, partly due to the fact that the poor wretches are miserably pinched before they seek our help, but that is all the more reason for giving them enough to eat when we do get hold of them, otherwise the word "relief" becomes a mockery, and it would be more merciful to let them die outright at the outset than linger for weeks on semi-starvation rations.

A NOTABLE SWINDLER.——We feel more angry with that swindler who is going about victimising dealers in railway plant and building materials than with swindlers in general, because, for the sake of making a petty gain, he causes such a vast expense and inconvenience. Thousands of tons of heavy goods are sent careering about the country in order to enable him to negotiate a few soi-disant loans. In fact, it is the Berners Street Hoax reproduced in various parts of the country, and applied as a convenient implement for obtaining cash advances. These swindlers are always described as having "a plausible address," and they must indeed be much more plausible than the majority of honest men. People who are really honest generally find tradesmen to whom they are strangers by no means gullible, but rather on the contrary bristling with suspicion. If you take a house in a neighbourhood where you are unknown, they demand cash promptly for goods supplied; if in a strange shop you order goods to be sent to your house, and desire to pay with a cheque somewhat in excess of the amount of the bill, the tradesman is wont politely to demur to hand you the balance in cash. The truth, we suspect, is that under such circumstances honest men are apt to be shamefaced and self-conscious, they are aware that the tradesman is mentally calculating whether they are rogues or not, and their knowledge of his suspicions discomposes them. The swindler has no such misgivings, he knows he is a scoundrel whatever the tradesmen may think, and so he steps into the shop as bold as brass, and assumes a "haristocratic" hauteur which is very effective with the British shopkeeper, especially when accompanied by a fashionably-dressed female companion, and a neatly appointed brougham at the door. Honesty, on the other hand, with a substantial balance at its bankers, is often mistrusted, because it arrives on foot, dusty or muddy, or alights from a twopenny omnibus. Still, we are surprised that our enterprising engineering friend took in so many 'cute firms. They must have been blinded by their greediness for "orders." In such cases it is always safe to resort to the telegraph. A shillingsworth of "wire" to the alleged orderer of the goods would have revealed the swindler in all his naked deformity, and they might have had the pleasure of offering him the choice of the nearest police station or a jolly good horsewhipping on the spot.

Our Illustrations

WITH THE RUSSIANS—THE SACKING OF SISTOVA

TAKING our illustrations in chronological order our first sketch portrays the burial of the Russian troops who fell during the great crossing of the Danube on the 27th ult., and next comes the "Sacking of Sistova," which represents the scene in the Turkish quarter of that town at the entry of the Russians at the close of last month. The Turkish inhabitants had fled at the approach of the Russians, and the Bulgarian Christians had taken the opportunity between their flight and the arrival of the troops to sack and wreck the whole quarter. "The pillage and destruction," wrote Mr. Forbes to the Daily News, "are as sweeping and universal as if the place had been sacked by a victorious army after a storming. There is not a whole pane of glass in the window of any Turkish house in all Sistova. Cupboards are smashed, floors torn up, shelves torn down, stoves broken in search of secreted money. The furniture was broken in sheer wantonness and the plaster shattered." Eight mosques also were wrecked, and the Turkish stores and shops pillaged of everything valuable, the fixtures of the interiors being smashed into fragments. In justice to the Russian soldiery we should state that they took no part in these wanton outrages, but on their entry immediately directed their efforts to stop the pillage.

BIELA

NEXT in order comes the entry into Biela, which took place on the 5th inst., where the Turks, having previously made feeble attempts to defend the place at the bridge head on the Jantra, quietly evacuated the town, which was accordingly occupied by General Arnoldi, who had moved eastward from the little village of Pavolo, for that purpose. During his halt at Pavolo our artist sketched the "Brush with the Enemy's Horse"—a few Turkish ponies having strayed into the camp and giving the Cossacks considerable trouble before they could be secured. It was on the road to Pavolo also that the sketch of the "Convoy to the Advance Posts" was taken, Mr. Forbes and our artist having fallen in with a long train of waggons belonging to Tutolmin's brigade of Circassian Cossacks, and which they found slowly wending its way to the front, escorted by a handful of dragoons. At the foot of every little rise in the road the waggon halted, and the men crept up and peered over the crest, to see whether any inimical marauders were in sight, and Circassians in particular, of whose prowess the men had a very high opinion.

On the 5th, General Arnoldi, with a brigade of dragoons under Colonel Bilderling, advanced towards Biela, halting for a while on some heights surrounding the town and the valley of the Jantra, and then, descending the road to the bridge, he despatched a detachment of dragoons to scale the opposite heights on foot. These men, officers as well as privates, carry rifles, and up they climbed in skirmishing order, and with an astonishing celerity, considering their heavy accoutrements, only to find on reaching the top an unfinished battery and emplacement completely empty, only a few straggling fugitives being visible in the far distance. In the mean time General Arnoldi had ridden to the bridge head, where he was met by the Christian inhabitants, "greeting him with profound humility of gladness," and had continually to kiss various crosses tendered by different priests. The general, however, did not enter the town immediately, but, mounting the heights himself, despatched small parties in search of the fugitive Turks, and then encamped outside the town. Our artist, however, found quarters in the town, and it was here that he witnessed the regrettable excesses of the soldiery as related in Mr. Forbes' letter of last week. His sketches on the "heights" are sufficiently explained by the titles.

THE OCCUPATION OF TIRNOVA

TIRNOVA, the ancient capital of the Bulgarian Czars, and a place of considerable strategical importance owing to its being the converging point of various roads leading to the chief passes through the Balkans, was occupied by an advanced post of Russian troops on the 7th inst.; but it was not until the 12th that the main body of Russians under the Grand Duke Nicholas, whose march from Sistova has been described as rather like a military promenade or a triumphal procession than a forced march, which it really was, the people turning out everywhere as the Russians passed with greetings of welcome, and the villages being decorated with triumphal arches. The reception at Tirnova was highly enthusiastic; the windows were filled with faces of pretty girls, flags, and streamers, while the people joyfully fraternised with the soldiery. The Grand Duke was received by the usual procession of priests chanting prayers in the old Sclavonic tongue, who conducted him to the church. After a short service he passed through the streets, where numerous arches inscribed with "Welcome" had been erected, and where the Grand Duke and his staff had to sustain a running fire of flowers from the owners of the pretty faces at the windows. Apart from its military importance, Tirnova, which is situated on the Jantra some thirty-five miles south of Sistova, is a town of some note, is said to contain 50,000 inhabitants, and possesses several manufactories of silk and cloth, with an active dyeing industry.

WITH THE TURKS IN EUROPE

THESE four sketches, engraved at the corners of our extra supplement, are from our artist with the Turks, and depict various incidents around Shumla. First we have our artist and another correspondent travelling from Shumla to Kaspitchan. Their conveyance, which was generally utilised by the correspondents, consisted of an old Victoria, which had already seen many years of service at Constantinople, and is now ending its days in retirement in the provinces. It was drawn by four horses abreast, the two centre animals having gay-looking headpieces of bronze-coloured leather. The coachman was an old Tartar, a capital driver, always urging his steeds at a wild gallop, his charge being nine francs for a "course" of two hours.—"A Day's Leave" depicts a Turkish foot-soldier whom our artist encountered between Varna and Shumla, and who was one of several who, getting a day's leave, had borrowed a horse and started to pay a visit to friends at a neighbouring village. As a rule the Turkish infantryman is a bad rider, and, grasping with one hand the cord which serves him for bridle, he holds tightly with the other the wooden pommel of the clumsy wooden saddle—singing loudly the while to manifest his enjoyment of his holiday.—"Fugitives from Rutschuk" form one of many similar sad scenes to be met with between that fortress and Schumla or Rasgrad. An old Mussulman bent with the weight of years has placed his wife and family, together with his portable worldly goods, into an "araba," and is seeking shelter from the Russian shells which have devastated his former home. In "An Ammunition Train" is shown the mode the Turks adopt to transport ammunition and provisions into the interior of the country—in long trains of ox-carts. These, our artist writes, as the Turks do not expect the Russians here just yet, are confided to the sole care of the drivers, who faithfully fulfil their duty, an escort of troops being only allowed when the enemy is known to be in the neighbourhood.

THE ZEIBECKS AT CONSTANTINOPLE

THESE unruly troops, who some weeks ago kept the inhabitants of Pera in a constant state of alarm and terror, are volunteers from the neighbourhood of Smyrna, and for the most part are ex-shepherds and carters. Although in time of war they have an alarmingly savage and ferocious appearance, it is said that in their own villages they are singularly hospitable, kind, and gentle to strangers. When in Pera, however, our artist writes, "they seem entirely to have changed their nature." They roved about the town in bands, so as the more easily to rob any ambulatory vendor of eatables, or pedlar, and entering the best cafés and restaurants would order all sorts of things without the slightest intention of payment. After this six or seven of them would enter a fiacre, and order the man to drive them to the camp, of course without the slightest remuneration. In consequence the public gardens and café concerts were closed, while the inhabitants walked the streets in fear and trembling as the Zeibecks made a point of jostling every passer-by, and drew their arms in reply to the slightest observation, in no way fearing the police, who took care never to interpose. In the camp itself, situated on the plain of Chikly, Pera, they frequently fought among themselves, the authorities in no way interfering, while a few paces off the combat another party would be dancing to the sound of a clarionet and drum. The Zeibecks were drilled at Pera for some weeks at a time, being furnished with neither uniform nor guns, and then were sent on to the interior to make way for fresh levies. Their costume is little varied, consisting mainly of a species of silk shirt open in front, and a gold embroidered cloth jacket, while they wear three different kinds of headdress, of which the most curious consists of a tremendous fez, stuffed out with cotton to keep its shape, and wound round with silken cord, from which hang long fringes of tassels which reach to the shoulders, producing a most singular effect. Round their waists the Zeibecks wear a voluminous silk sash, which contain various leather pouches and their arms, which mainly consist of sharp-pointed yataghans. Short breeches, and occasionally leggings, complete the costume of these troops.

WITH THE RUSSIANS IN ASIA—BEFORE KARS

OUR extra supplement shows the Russian position during the recent siege of Kars, the sketch being taken on June 24 before the Russians had retired from attacking the town, the siege, which commenced in May, having been raised about the middle of the present month.

The town and citadel of Kars, so famous by its heroic defence in 1855, lies about seventy-two miles south of Alexandropol, and is situated in a species of amphitheatre formed by the slopes of a high hill cut through by a river, Kars-Tchai. The town is surrounded by a continuous wall, and the highest ridge of the hill is crowned by the citadel. As, however, the fortifications are too weak to resist a protracted siege, and the walls are no protection against modern artillery, the Turks have surrounded the town with strong detached forts, mainly built under the superintendence of British engineers, thus converting the place into a position of extreme strength. These exterior fortifications crown a ridge of hills which approach the town from the north-east and west; but the three principal forts are on the plain on the east and south of the town. All the surrounding heights compose these groups under the names of the Karadagh, the Shwrakh, and the Tchakmack Hill. It would be tiresome to the reader to give a complete geographical description of these, and we refer him to our extra supplement, where he will see that the Karadagh is the highest, being a continuation of the ridge on which stands the citadel. Fort Karadagh contains a curious elevated tower or battery called "Ziaret," together with defensive barracks and a glacis for defence by artillery and musketry. A second fort on the same height is Fort Arab, which, built on the rock on the top of a high precipice, commands the opposite bank of the river. There are fourteen forts in all, and of these Fort Hafiz Pasha, Fort Kanli, and Fort Suwari are in the plain, and the remainder lie on the opposite or left bank of the river. Of these Fort Inglis is an enclosed lunette; and Fort Muchlis is an irregular lunette, the latter being open at the gorge, and situated on the Tschakmack plateau, where it falls steeply into the river. Fort Tachmash, which consists of two bastioned forts, and is intended to bar the approach to the Schorakh Heights, was stormed by the Russians in 1855. Fort Tikh-Tepessi is a work of bastioned race; and close by is a battery which was captured by the Russians on June 20; while Fort Laz-Tepessi, consisting of three distinct batteries, is situated on a rocky summit, the "Bashi Bazouk" Hill, and dominates the whole neighbourhood.

KUBAN COSSACKS RETURNING FROM RECONNOITRING

THE Kuban Cossacks, as their name implies, come from the district of the River Kuban, on the Russian side of the Caucasus, and are descended from the Zaropoghians, who settled on that river at the request of Catherine II. of Russia, who wished thus to create a natural defence of what was then the Russian frontier. They are bold and active warriors, and as from their birth they are continually skirmishing with the Tcherkess or Circassians, they have acquired an immense fund of intrepidity, cunning, and perseverance, which qualifies them admirably for reconnoitring troops, in which capacity they are generally employed. Their horses, also, from long service on the steppes, are exceedingly wary and timid, owing to the nightly aggressions of the wolves to which their picketings are exposed. A certain apprehensive feeling keeps these horses from any profound sleep, and engenders a constant state of watchfulness, thus rendering their senses marvellously acute—a quality of vital importance to their master.

A REBEL CIRCASSIAN HORSEMAN

ON the outbreak of the present war, some of the Circassian tribes of the Caucasus under Russian dominion once more took the opportunity to raise the standard of revolt, and prompted by Turkish emissaries, who promised them every assistance, at one time threatened to give very serious trouble to the Russians. The Turks, true to their word, attempted to aid them, and by the capture of Soukhoum Kaleh were enabled to land a few troops on the Russian shore, together with a son of the famous chief Schamyl, whose name was to be used as a war-cry by the rebels. The Russians, however, took energetic measures to stamp out the revolt, and for some weeks we have heard nothing more of the revolt. We may mention that under the generic title "Circassian" are included a large number of tribes, each with a distinctive name of its own, such as Ahkhasian Adijè, Barrakai, &c. The Circassian is very much like the Cossack, but even more predatory and cruel, and less amenable to discipline.

THE PERUVIAN TIDAL WAVE AND EARTHQUAKE

UPWARDS of six hundred lives were lost, many ships were wrecked or damaged, and an immense amount of property was destroyed by the tidal wave which burst on the western coast of South America in the month of May last, and which extended from Callão in the north to Chili in the south. The shocks of earthquake, though severe, did little damage; and the destruction of life and property was chiefly caused by the frightful upheaval and ingress of the sea. The flourishing town of Iquique, the principal port for nitrate shipments, is left as complete a ruin now as it was after the earthquake and inundation of 1867. At Arica, the sea washed over the town to the hill at the back of the church, and destroyed much valuable property. The wreck of the U.S. steamer Wateree, carried inland a couple of miles by the tidal wave of 1868, was again floated, and carried a mile or two further up the coast. The smelting and other mining works at Autogasta were all swept away. The shipping at Pabellon de Pica and the guano deposits suffered severely. The sea in some places rose sixty feet. At Callão the docks and piers suffered most, and a quantity of merchandise temporarily stowed on the docks was ruined by the water. Our sketches, for which we are indebted to Mr. J. Miller, of Melville House, Mount View Road, Hornsey, do not need much further explanation. The lower town of Pabellon de Pica, in which there were 5,000 inhabitants, was almost entirely swept away. At Iquique, the rich were the chief sufferers, the part of the town most affected being the warehouses close to the waterside. From the bay Iquique looked much the same as ever, but on landing the havoc made was wofully apparent. One of our sketches shows a house in the principal commercial street of Iquique, most of which had been completely washed away, and with it property to the amount of one and a half million dollars.

SCENES IN THE STELVIO PASS

THE picturesque views shown in these two engravings are especially interesting just now, as representing the scene of the wife-murder of which M. Henri de Tourville has been convicted in an Austrian court of Justice. M. de Tourville, alias Pehreau, is a native of France, who has been naturalised in this country. He is about forty years of age, and early in 1875, he being then a widower, was married to a widow lady named Pike, who was some seven years his senior, and who made a will by which, at her death, he would inherit a fortune of 37,000*l.* In July last year they were travelling together in the Austrian Tyrol, and on the 15th of that month, when they had reached a point in the road which winds round the mountains between Trafoi and Franzenshoehe, he dismissed his carriage, telling the driver that he and his wife would proceed on foot. An hour or so later he arrived at Trafoi and said that his wife had fallen down and hurt herself. He, however, showed no signs of anxiety or grief, and merely asked that some one might go back with him to fetch her. After some search, the body of the poor lady was found under the edge of cliff. De Tourville was at once suspected of having killed her, and was taken into custody, but was subsequently released and came to England, where he was rearrested, and, after an examination at Bow Street, was sent back to Austria, under the Extradition Act, to undergo the trial which has ended in his conviction.

"WAITING FOR THE VERDICT"

THIS sketch represents a scene which was of too frequent occurrence at the Glasgow police-courts during the dog-panic which prevailed in that city in the early part of the present year. The authorities, alarmed by some foolish rumours as to the prevalence of hydrophobia, gave orders that all dogs found in the streets unaccompanied by their owners should be forthwith "comprehended," and unless claimed within a few hours should be destroyed. This absurd and cruel regulation was enforced for some time, and very many valuable animals were put to death without rhyme or reason. At last, however, the magistrates were brought to their senses by the institution of a number of actions for damages, and the raid was at once stopped. In our sketch the intelligent and trustful expression of the beautiful collie which is "Waiting for the Verdict" ought, one would have imagined, to have been sufficient to protect his life, but we fear that it was of little avail with such judges as he had.

"WHAT'S THAT?"

NOT a very unnatural exclamation to proceed from the lips of a young lady, who is endowed with nerves of the ordinary feminine calibre, and who is engaged in traversing the recesses of a thick wood with no companion save her Spitz dog, a species of the canine tribe which is more addicted to barking than to biting. Amid the general silence of a wood, which is at times almost oppressive, especially during the heat of a summer's day, when the birds rock themselves to sleep, and even the insects indulge in a siesta, a sudden crackling of branches is especially startling, conjuring up as it does visions of ill-looking men armed with bludgeons, and lying in wait for their prey. The noise is generally to be accounted for by some far less alarming cause. Either a decayed limb has fallen from a tree with a crash, or some beast of prey of the harmless sort still to be found in these islands—a stoat or polecat, may be—has for the nonce abandoned his nocturnal habits, and is making a daylight raid in hopes of finding some victim asleep. In this, or half-a-dozen other ways, we may answer our heroine's exclamation.

WISCONSIN SCENERY

LYING, as it does, nearly in the centre of the North American Continent, and extending as far north as the 47th parallel of latitude, the climate of the State of Wisconsin is very severe during the winter months, and hence it, with its sister State of Minnesota, which lies still further north, is a favourite resort for emigrants from the Scandinavian countries of Europe—Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Iceland. Wisconsin, which covers about the same area as England and Wales, may be described as a broad undulating plain, many parts of which are densely timbered, and dotted over with small lakes. Along the north-eastern shore, which is bounded by Lake Superior, and on the western border, mounds or bluffs of considerable elevation occur, and some of these have been fashioned by the long-continued action of the sun, air, and water into very quaint and fantastic shapes, as shown in our sketches. These formations, which appear to be more common in the New World than in the Old, may imaginatively be supposed to be supplied by Nature to atone for the absence of the picturesque ruins of castles and abbeys with which the landscape of Europe is diversified.

H.M.S. "INFLEXIBLE"

THE controversy which is now going on with regard to the merits of this ship as a vessel of war turns upon the question whether the fire of an enemy directed against her unarmoured ends would or would not have the effect of depriving her of that stability and buoyancy which are the very first requisites in naval architecture. The Inflexible is a turret-ship of the citadel kind, the turrets or battery being situated amidships. The central division of the hull is heavily armoured with iron plates and teak backing, and there seems to be no dispute as to the strength or efficiency of this portion of the vessel, but, beyond its limits fore and aft, the vertical armour plating gives place to a horizontal shot-proof deck, and the sides of the hull are left unprotected. A shot striking this portion of the hull, broadside, would first meet with an iron plating of 1 inch in thickness, which would be little or no obstacle. It would then come to a cork belt backing for stability and flotation. Behind this cork is a water-tight gallery called the "coffer-dam," in which are enclosed four watertight coal compartments. In action this passage would be stuffed with sacking, the expected effect of which would be to break the force of a projectile, and perhaps change its course, as well as to hinder the inflow of water through the breach made by the shot. The coal stowed in the watertight compartments would further assist in checking the force of the projectile. The contention of those who are dissatisfied with the Inflexible is that she would have no stability independent of her unarmoured ends, but, on the other hand, it is argued, that it would be practically impossible to deprive her entirely of their support, and therefore that for all practical purposes she will make a trustworthy and valuable fighting vessel. We have no wish to enter into the controversy. Suffice it to say that Mr. Ward Hunt has accepted the responsibility of completing the vessel on the original plans, and that being so, we can only hope that events may prove that Mr. E. J. Reed has been over-anxious and mistaken. To revert to our engraving, Fig. 1 is a plan of the lower deck, exhibiting the proportion of the armoured and unarmoured parts of the vessel; Fig. 2 shows the peculiar position of the turrets, placed not as in ordinary ships, in the centre of the ship, but diagonally and on either side in order to give the guns a wider sweep. Fig. 3 is a section of one of the vulnerable ends near the centre of the vessel; Fig. 4 the midship section containing the turrets, boilers, engines, &c. In Fig. 7 we have a bow view of the ship preparing for action, all top-hamper spar rigging being thrown over the lee side, leaving her as shown in Fig. 5. The rest of the sketches require no explanation.

NOTE.——In our description last week of the new steamer Lord of the Isles, we erroneously stated that she belonged to Messrs. Hutcheson and Co., the owners of the Iona, &c. The new vessel, we are informed, is the property of the Glasgow and Inverary Steamboat Company, and her speed is 22 miles (not 20) an hour, the fact being that she is one of the fastest paddle steamers afloat.—In our article last week on Tunbridge Wells we stated that the Sussex Hotel had vanished. We are now informed by the proprietor that the "Sussex" stands where it has always stood, and is as flourishing as ever.

HOME.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The one great agitating topic of the week has been the despatch of 3,000 troops to reinforce the garrisons of Malta and Gibraltar. Her Majesty's Ministers have been judiciously reticent as to their reasons for this step. Nothing could well be imagined more delightfully vague than the replies of Lord Derby and Sir Stafford Northcote. The garrisons are below their proper strength, and "in view of the uncertain and disturbed condition of Europe," or "the unsettled state of the Mediterranean region;" it is unadvisable to allow them to remain so. This commits the Government to nothing either way, and leaves every one to give the reins to his imagination and explain the facts this way or that as to him shall seem best; and indeed this has been done with a vengeance by the daily newspapers, each vehemently contending that the action of Government is susceptible of but one interpretation, which is of course that which the particular print has all along foreseen would be the policy that circumstances would develop. Meanwhile the Cabinet wisely keeps its own council, and goes steadily on its way, doubtless with the honest intention of doing its best for "British Interests" in the difficult position into which European politics are driftng.—The main topic dealt with by Mr. Bright, at Bradford, on Wednesday, after paying tribute to the character of the man whose statue he had unveiled, was, of course, the Eastern Question, and the position of England with regard to it. He spoke at great length, reviewing the course of events since 1859, and said that it was unfortunate that there was a war party both in the Press and in Parliament, though he believed that it was not strong enough to prevail against the true interests of the country. He thought that if Russia was not allowed to approach Constantinople it would tend to prolong the war. Our demands with regard to the Bosphorus and the closing of the Suez Canal were felt by other nations to be unreasonable and arrogant, and there was great danger of an European combination against us, which would result in our humiliation as a nation. Our true policy, both in morals and statesmanship, was one of neutrality, and if that were adhered to Britain might one day, clearing off her ancient errors, lead the grand procession of the nations in the path of civilization and peace.—While Mr. Bright was engaged in eulogising the great apostle of Free Trade, Lord Hartington was being made free of the Fishmongers' Company of London. In returning thanks for the honour, he alluded to our foreign policy, and said that both Lord Granville and himself had endeavoured to keep the subject clear of party politics, although he admitted that that was a difficult thing to do. They had never denied that British interests were involved, and though they had thought that the disastrous war might have been avoided had our Government conducted matters differently, yet since the outbreak of hostilities they had strengthened the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers in maintaining a strict and calm neutrality, believing that such was the real wish of the nation, and the best course for its interests.

Matrimonial Eccentricities.——The Dunmow. Flitch was on Monday duly claimed by and bestowed upon a happy couple, who, after twenty-eight years of married-life, were able to swear that no quarrel or regret had ever clouded the clear sky of their connubial felicity.—In default of being able to live happily with one's wife it is useful to know how to get rid of her without incurring the expenses of the Divorce Court. This problem appears to have been solved by one Frederick Dudley, a bricklayer, of Birmingham, who, when charged, the other day, with having left his spouse chargeable to the parish, coolly produced a stamped agreement of separation, to which their respective marks were attached. The document was lengthy and curiously worded, but perhaps Mr. Dudley would not have found it of much use had it not been for the fact that the lady had put herself beyond the protection of the law by her disregard of the seventh commandment.—A curious incident occurred at the nuptials of a French couple at Dover the other day. An awkward pause was made in the ceremony in consequence of the bridegroom's inability to find the ring. After a fruitless search, and an equally vain endeavour to borrow a substitute, the clergyman sent the verger for the key of the church door, but the "eye" of this was found to be too small for the bride's finger. The difficulty was at last overcome by using a steel key-ring belonging to the bridegroom.

The Wimbledon Meeting came to an end on Saturday with the distribution of prizes by H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge, and the usual display of athletic feats, which form a somewhat poor substitute for the review and march past which in former years attracted so many sight-seers to the Common. On the Thursday the Lords and Commons match was won by the representatives of the Upper Chamber. The Public School prizes fell to Cheltenham, and the Elcho Shield to the Irish Team, who made some magnificent scores. On Friday the chief event was the competitions by Mounted Riflemen for the Loyd-Lindsay Prize, which was carried off by the Warwickshire Yeomanry. At the close of the meeting Lieut.-Colonel Phillips, the Camp Commandant, issued an order expressing his satisfaction with the conduct and discipline of the majority of the Volunteers, but remarking that some of the non-commissioned officers appear to have been appointed without regard to their fitness for the duties, and that there is still great laxness amongst the Volunteer ranks as regards speaking to officers without saluting them. He is glad that the discreditable incongruities of costume are becoming more rare, and hopes that in another year there will be no room for censure in this respect.

The Engineer Volunteer Corps in camp at Chatham have been working energetically and earnestly constructing redoubts and other military fortifications. The first battalion completed its work on Tuesday last, and left the camp to make room for the second battalion, which arrived on that day. The drill was to be brought to a conclusion yesterday, Friday, when some siege operations on an extensive scale were to take place in the presence of H.R.H. the Commander-in-Chief, who would also inspect the various fortifications which have been erected, and review the troops and volunteers in camp.

London Mortality decreased last week, and 1,438 deaths were registered against 1,449 during the previous seven days, showing a decline of 11, and being at the rate of 21·2 per 1,000. There were 173 deaths from diarrhœa, an increase of 4, but being 116 below the average. Deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs numbered 181, an increase of 22, and being 35 above the average. The fatal cases of small-pox rose from 32 to 35; the Metropolitan Asylum Small-pox Hospitals contained 588 cases on Saturday last. There were 42 deaths from measles (an increase of 14), 19 from scarlet fever, 6 from diphtheria, 36 from whooping-cough (a decline of 10), and 21 from different forms of fever. There were 2,415 births registered against 2,310 the previous week. Only 37·8 hours of sunshine were registered out of 112 hours that the sun was above the horizon. The mean temperature was 56·1°, or 3·4° below the average.

Miscellaneous.——On Tuesday the Lord Mayor gave a banquet at the Mansion House to the Brethren of the Trinity House and the members of the Thames Conservancy Board, and in responding to the toast of "The Lady Mayoress" alluded to her approaching marriage, remarking that it was 200 years since any wedding had been celebrated in St. Paul's Cathedral, and that never had a Lady Mayoress been known to have been married there. Sir Garnet Wolseley, responding for "The Army," said that our forces were never in a more efficient condition, and in allusion to the War remarked that when our neighbour's house was on fire and our own roof threatened it was time to look to our fire-engines.—H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge on Tuesday presented commissions and prizes to the successful cadets at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. The sword of honour, which is usually presented for exemplary conduct, was withheld, as the general behaviour of the cadets had not been good, although no serious offence had been committed.—The first stone of a new wing of the Oxford Military College was laid on Saturday by the Earl of Morley, who also presented some prizes and delivered an address to the students.—A conference as to the best means of educating the deaf and dumb was commenced on Tuesday at the rooms of the National Social Science Association.—Two enterprising Americans, Capt. Crapo and his wife, have by good luck got safely across the Atlantic in a cockle-shell of a boat some ten feet in length. They are said to have suffered much from exposure and want of sleep, but we can feel no sympathy for them when we reflect upon the utter uselessness of such an undertaking.

Music

Royal Italian Opera.——Beyond the fact that the Ophelia of Mdlle. Albani becomes year after year a more finished impersonation (more poetical it could hardly be), and that both in a vocal and dramatic sense it may fairly take rank with her Senta, Elizabeth, and Elsa—her Wagnerian trilogy—there is nothing to add to what has already been said about it. To follow Christine Nilsson in this, one of the brightest of her creations, was no grateful task; but here success has recompensed ambition, and the Ophelia of the fair Canadian is pronounced by competent judges only second to that of the fair Swede. The Hamlet of Signor Cotogni shows every indication of earnest sympathy and careful study. It is not Faure's conception; but it is Cotogni's, and Signor Cotogni has a good deal to say for himself. The Queen of Mdlle. D'Angeri is now what it has always been—thoughtful and intelligent; and by no means the least striking incident of the performance is the great scene between the two—the scene of the portraits. The other characters are more or less well sustained; and yet, though only presented once in a way, the opera of M. Ambroise Thomas, despite its unquestionable merit, has not up to this time succeeded in impressing the London public to any great extent. On Saturday night the season came to an end with Verdi's Aida.

Her Majesty's Opera.——In consequence of the departure of M. Faure, Il Trovatore was substituted for Otello on the occasion of Signor Tamberlik's benefit. On Tuesday night Rigoletto was performed, with the new singer, Madame Gerster, as Gilda. We are inclined to think that were Madame Gerster to turn aside for a time from parts the prevalent characteristics of which are florid passages, more or less elaborately ornamented, and devote her attention seriously to the study and practice of the plain cantilena, where level singing is indispensable, she would improve the quality of her middle voice without in any way endangering the supremacy of her favourite high notes. The manner in which she sang more than one cantabile phrase on Tuesday night convinced us of this. As examples we would especially point to her delivery of the melodious passage "Quanto affetto," &c., which begins her share in the expressive duet with Rigoletto ("Veglia, O! donna, questo fiore"), and Gilda's recital to her father of the story of her clandestine meetings with Walter Malde, the pretended student. The charming soliloquy "Caro nome," but for two florid cadenzas quite out of keeping with its character, would have been irreproachable. Looked at as a whole, the Gilda of Madame Gerster is hardly up to the level of her Amina, Lucia, or Elvira. Madame Gerster has yet to acquire experience in the histrionic department of her calling; but if she possesses the intelligence for which we are inclined to credit her, she will doubtless acquire it. The Rigoletto of Signor Del Puente, as times go, is of more than average merit, and, seeing that we have no longer a Ronconi among us, more than acceptable. Signor Talbo as the Duke attempts too much, and perhaps for that reason achieves too little. He has a good voice, and should employ it with less continuous forcing; otherwise, one of these days it may chance to fail him. The most completely artistic performance is that of Madame Trebelli, in the part of Maddalena, which, though comparative a small one, the clever lady raises to importance. The Huguenots, on Wednesday, once more introduced to us the Valentine of Madame Christine Nilsson. It is a pity we should be allowed so few occasion of hearing the accomplished Scandinavian in this romantic part, for which her personal attributes as well as natural genius eminently fit her. This was our opinion when she first tried it—in 1874—an opinion strengthened the year following, and by this last essay fully confirmed. It was time that Madame Nilsson should exhibit her inborn capacity for the adequate impersonation of characters belonging to the highest walks of lyric drama, instead of limiting her splendid resources to the ordinary routine of conventional Italian opera, with Margaret, Mignon, or Ophelia occasionally thrown in. Now, in her golden prime, it becomes not only her right, but her duty, to turn it to the best uses, if only for the sake of that art of which she is so brilliant an ornament. Her Valentine, to be brief, ranks among the most finished performances witnessed of recent years on the operatic boards. It is poetically conceived, deeply studied, elaborately wrought out, and—a charm in itself where such an engaging individuality as that of Madame Nilsson is concerned—original. Of late years Madame Nilsson has been making extraordinary progress as an actress. This was especially shown on Wednesday night. The superb duet between Valentine and Raoul, after the chorus of the "Blessing of the Swords" was, as it should ever be, the culminating point. A more vivid impression than was created by this fine display of vocal and dramatic power could scarcely be imagined. Wagner, by the way, has done some good, in one special direction, for during this animated scene, which in his Oper und Drama the musician of the Nibelungen extols so highly, as having, through its poetical significance, inspired the composer, with whom Wagner deals so harshly, every attempt at demonstrative approval was hushed down. At the fall of the curtain, however, the applause from all parts of the house was as hearty as it was unanimous, and Madame Nilsson was compelled to appear four times in succession before the curtain, accompanied by her occasionally somewhat obstreperous but always enthusiastic Raoul (Sig. Fancelli). The other characters were as before. This performance of the Huguenots was the event of the season. Madame Nilsson should now try Norma, Semiramide—even Fidelio—to each and any of which characters she is in all respects eminently suited. It would be worth while to revive the Vestale of Spontini, or, still better, the Armida of Gluck, for such an artist. I Puritani was the opera on Thursday. Last night we were promised Faust, for the last appearance of Madame Nilsson. To night Il Flauto Magico, with Madame Gerster as the "Queen of Night," brings one more opera season to an end.

Waifs.——The post of secretary to the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club, left vacant through the death of Mr. Edward Land, has been accepted by Mr. W. H. Cummings, than whom, for more reasons than one, a more eligible successor could hardly be named.

Scraps

The Walker Art Gallery at Liverpool, presented to the town by the Mayor, will be opened by Lord Derby on September 6.

The Works of the New National Opera-House on the Thames Embankment will be resumed next week, and the building is to be roofed and internally finished by Lady Day.

Feminine Curiosity is proverbially dangerous, and a striking instance is given by an advertisement quoted from a provincial newspaper by the Live Stock Journal and Fanciers' Gazette: "Will any one kindly lend a lady a live Colorado beetle for a few days? Great care shall be taken of it. Payment if desired. Address K. L., office of this paper."

The First Submarine Telegraph Cable manufactured in France was successfully laid last week between Havre and Honfleur. To the former town it was transported from the manufactory at Grenelle. Several ingenious novelties for receiving and paying out telegraph cable were used, the invention of Mr. Henry Menier, which will be of interest to telegraph engineers as contributing greatly to the success of the occasion.

The Fifth Annual Dinner of the employés of Messrs. H. R. Baines and Co. (Limited), proprietors of The Graphic, took place at the "Ship Hotel," Shepperton, on Saturday last the 21st inst., the chair being occupied by Arthur Locker, Esq. A capital dinner was provided, of which about fifty partook. Songs and speeches followed, and the party did not break up till a late hour. The stewards were Messrs. E. and H. Hall.

The Barrenness of Dramatic Invention in England is noted by the Paris Figaro, which gives with considerable pride the lists of adaptations from the French now occupying the English stage. Thus at the Lyceum there is the Courrier de Lyon; at the Adelphi, Les Pauvres de Paris (Streets of London); at the Criterion, Les Dominos Roses; at the Princess's, Les Oiseaux de Proie (After Dark); at the Alhambra, Orphée aux Enfers; while recently the Haymarket has given Le Mari à la Campagne (The Serious Family); the Prince of Wales's, Le Village (The Vicarage); the Globe, Montjoye (Mammon); and the Olympic, Le Portfeuille Rouge (the Scuttled Ship).

The Annexation of the Transvaal.——The following, which we reprint verbatim, has come to us by postcard from Utrecht:—

A FRIENDLY HINT.

About one hundred Years ago. Pit committed blunder on blunder till he drove the Americans mad. The results are known.

Now a days the Secretary of State Carnavon, Commits blunder on blunder. He will drive the Africans mad. What will be the results.

It is wiser to deal friendly with a free people than to Indispose a growing Nation.

The American Sample ought to teach the rulers, that National hatred does not easily wear off.

Would Carnavon imitate Peel and change his Policy in time, he would be in reality the great Statesman he fancies himself to be.

The Prevention of Sea-Sickness a subject interesting to many at the present season of holiday tours is discussed by the Medical Examiner, which states that the Union Médicale recommends the following simple method for the prevention of sea-sickness. A few drops—say from three to eight—of the nitrate of amyle are applied closely to the nose by means of a handkerchief. The inhalation must be rapid, care being taken to prevent the mixture of atmospheric air in any great quantity. The patient will soon feel a sense of pulsation in the temples and the face, losing its deadly hue, presents a light rose colour. These signs of salutary reaction continue for about half-an-hour, after which the individual falls asleep. The sickness may recommence in twenty-four hours or so; the inhalation, in such case, must be repeated as before. The remedy appears to act most efficaciously when employed immediately after the first act of vomiting. This method has been tried on 124 persons. In 121 cases the sickness was stopped at once; that is to say no efforts of vomiting were noted. In the remaining three cases it was necessary to repeat the inhalation two or three times, before the desired results were obtained.

Volunteer Sick-Bearers.——A meeting in connection with the scheme for organising this corps of volunteer sick-bearers was held on Wednesday at the establishment of the Society of Arts. Lieutenant-Colonel Loyd-Lindsay, M.P., presided. The Association, of which Mr. M'Clure is the secretary, proposes to establish in a few principal towns medical schools where volunteer surgeons may acquire the special training necessary for the skilful treatment of the wounded in the field, so that they should be in a position afterwards to instruct two or more men per company in the duties of sick-bearers. Several gentlemen have already notified their willingness to undergo the needful preparation, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge has approved of the proposal, and Miss Florence Nightingale has placed her name on a list of subscriptions opened in connection with it. No support having as yet been derived from the War Office, it was resolved yesterday, on the motion of Major Duncan, to petition that department to allow a competent medical officer to be quartered in London for the purpose of imparting instruction.

A Valuable Memento of American Independence is to be presented to the Queen by the Government of the United States. It is a State paper, "The Administrators of the United States Government at the beginning of its second century," and consists of a large sheet with an allegorical representation of the States, and the signatures of 401 Government officials ranging from the President to the Representatives. The paper bears at the top an eagle grasping a shield, olive branches, the cap of Liberty, and a scroll inscribed with the word "Constitution." On each side of the bird is a stand of colours, the whole resting on a representation of Plymouth Rock, which bears the dates 1776-1876, and the national motto "E Pluribus Unum." The border consists of faggots, typifying the original thirteen States, bound together with a band of stars, while above these are olive and oak branches—peace and strength—and a shield with similar emblems appears at each corner. This document is hermetically sealed between plates of glass, and was shown at the Philadelphia Exhibition. Copies are to be sent to the American State Libraries, and to the foreign Governments represented at the Centennial.

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The Russians are now fairly south of the Balkans, and having captured the Shipka Pass, are preparing for a march upon Adrianople. Throughout this campaign they have faithfully followed the German plan of invasion as practised in 1870, and, leaving strong detachments of their army before each strong Turkish position as they passed by it, have advanced rapidly through the country with their main body. As yet they have not encountered any serious opposition, for the Turkish ex-Commander-in-Chief Abd-ul-Kerim Pasha has kept his forces in such a determined state of inactivity and repose as to engender the idea that his apathy—which his friends can only excuse by reason of his advanced years and a chronic disease—has been purchased by Russian gold. The Sultan, however, now that his mind is thoroughly aroused to the danger of the situation, has taken matters into his own hand, and dismissing Abd-ul-Kerim, has appointed Mehemet Ali Pasha is his place, an energetic man of forty-seven, and a German by birth, though Ottoman by education. Suleiman Pasha also, who has shown considerable skill and energy in the recent Montenegrin campaign, has been appointed to the command of the forces south of the Balkans, and has now arrived at Adrianople with 20,000 of tried troops, and has effected a junction with Réouf Pasha—their joint forces amounting to 60,000 men. Thus, although the Russians have made good their advance throughout Bulgaria, and have even passed the dreaded Balkans, they may yet expect considerable trouble from the Turks, whose army as yet is undiminished—save by the few thousand men who surrendered at Nicopolis, and who have not, like their colleagues in Asia, had an opportunity to meet the Russians face to face. A few days will now probably bring about some sharp decisive fighting, as both Mehemet Ali and Suleiman Pashas have orders to take the offensive as soon as possible.

To resume our chronicle of events, the Shipka Pass was captured by Generals Gourko and Mursky, who, marching from Eski Sagra, where, as we detailed last week, they had crossed the mountains by a small mule track pass, boldly attacked and captured Kazanlik, the town at the mouth of the Shipka Pass, and subsequently made an attack on the Turkish entrenchments in the pass itself. The first attempt failed, and the Russians were driven back, but a second attack proved successful, and the Turks abandoning eight splendid positions, all well-fortified, the pass was occupied by the Russians.

The latter owe a good deal of their success to the Bulgarian guides, who led the advance guard over small passes only known to themselves, and consequently in no way defended by the Turks. North of the Balkans the Russians have met with a reverse, having been repulsed during an attack on Plevna on the 20th inst. by Osman Pasha, against whom the Grand Duke Nicholas is now concentrating a large force. The Russians have captured Tchneravoda, and are consequently in possession of the whole line of Trajan's Wall, but are devoting their main energies to the reduction of Rustchuk, where 60,000 men are said to have retreated. The Czarevitch, with 75,000 troops, under Prince Tchankovskoy and General Homovsky, is now busily investing the fortress, which at the same time is being actively bombarded by the batteries at Slobosia and Giurgevo. In the Dobrudscha General Zimmermann now has 45,000 men, and is ready to render powerful aid in the operations against Silistria, Varna, and Shumla, although it is hardly likely that any attack will be made on the last-named position, where the main body of the Turkish army is now stationed under Mehemet Ali. There have been plenty of skirmishes with no important results, the Turks claiming a small success between Shumla and Osman Bazar, at Kadikoi, and near Silistria. As for the Turks, the Russian advance has created considerable alarm south of the Balkans, and the various towns are striving to put themselves in a state of defence, Philippopolis setting the example by organising a National Guard. The railway traffic with Adrianople and the north is now interrupted, and the Turkish families are fast flying to the south. At Constantinople there is a perfect panic, not only from the fear of the Russian advance but also from the dread of the Turkish irregulars who may thus be forced back upon the capital. The Palace Cabal has been broken, and Redif Pasha has been disgraced, together with Abd-ul-Kerim, and both are to be court-martialled, but Mahmoud Damad still remains at the head of affairs, though as we have said the Sultan is now beginning to think and act for himself.

The Porte continues to accuse the Russian troops of committing great cruelties upon fugitive Mussulmans and their wives and children, and a circular testifying to the truth of the terrible massacre of fugitives and other atrocities which we alluded to last week has been signed by twenty newspaper correspondents at Shumla, amongst whom are the representatives of The Times, Morning Post, Daily Telegraph, Manchester Guardian, Morning Advertiser, Scotsman, New York Herald, our own artist, and the artist of the Illustrated London News. Another circular issued by the Porte details the various villages burnt and the number of inhabitants massacred by the Russians and Bulgarians. Some dozen villages are mentioned, with an aggregate of 4,763 victims, besides a number burnt alive in a mosque at Chiansi Keui, and of many thousand houses burnt and utterly destroyed. Of course these statements are probably exaggerated, but it is certainly the duty of the Russian Government when invading a country in the name of "Humanity and Christianity" to give some reply to such categorical accusations of barbarity, and, with a civilised Power, unprecedented atrocities—which in some cases are vouched for by the signatures of English gentlemen. On their side the Russians accuse the Turks of atrocities upon the Christians, and of firing upon a flag of truce, while in consequence of rumours of Turkish outrages Mr. Layard has sent our gunboat Rapid to Karavarna in order to protect the Christians.

GREECE, in consequence of rumours of Turkish outrages upon the Christians in the Greek provinces of the Porte, is working herself into a war fever, and military preparations are being actively pushed forward, while the insurrectionary agitation in Crete is being busily fanned.—SERVIA, also, is singing Te Deums at Belgrade for the success of the Russians, and the Skuptschina has granted the Minister of War a credit for the maintenance of a corps of observation, and to establish a camp of militia.—From MONTENEGRO we hear of resumed hostilities and the capture of several Turkish positions in the Duga Pass, and in the neighbourhood of Nicksics and from ROUMANIA it is reported that a force under General Manu has at last crossed the Danube, and is operating with the Russians at Nikopol.

From ASIA the only news appears to be a few skirmishes of minor importance round Kars.

FRANCE.——There is little actual news. The Government and the Liberals are continuing their warfare, the latter making a point of acting in a strictly legal manner, and accordingly, instead of violently abusing and opposing the arbitrary measures which the Cabinet have taken to prevent the propagation and sale of the Republican journals, are quietly prosecuting those various Prefects and sub-Prefects, who have been active in prohibiting the sale of such prints as the Temps and Bien Public. An attack also in the Ministerial Bulletin des Communes on the 363 Deputies, calling them "Communists" and other approbrious names, has been declared "slanderous" by the Liberal jurists, who state that each individual Deputy can prosecute the Government for defamation. This Bulletin des Communes is being actively circulated throughout the provincial villages, 250,000 copies being printed weekly, and in articles entitled "A Radical Forger," "The Radicals at the Bar of Justice," and the "Break-up of the 363" violently abuses the Liberals, and urges the peasantry to vote for the Conservatives, threatening them with every species of disaster, even down to famine, if they do otherwise. The Railway Strike across the Atlantic is also made by the Conservatives the text for various sermons against all Republican and Radical institutions. The Minister of Finance has issued a circular to his employés, telling them that the Government will point out the candidate who is to be elected, and will brook no insubordination. The Marshal starts for his provincial tour to-day (Saturday), and will, according to an official announcement, deliver an important speech during his tour.

Paris is tranquil, and has been mainly occupied with discussing a scandalous trial of a woman who employed a workman to blind her lover with sulphuric acid, in order that she might nurse him and gain possession of his money in case of his death. A more fiendish deed has scarcely ever been perpetrated, even in Paris. It is now the dead season in theatrical circles, but there has been one first representation—Les Trois Bougeoirs, a bright little one-act comedy by MM. Eugène Grange and Victor Bernard, at the Gymnase, and a revival of Beaumarchais' Barbier de Seville at the Comédie Française, that famous piece which, after being prohibited for three years a century and two years ago, created so great a sensation at the Court of Louis XVI.

From the provinces come prognostications of a good wine and corn harvest, and the news of the sudden death of the Bishop of Nevers, whose Ultramontane circular brought about the anti-Clerical vote of the late Chamber of Deputies.

UNITED STATES.——The railway strike has assumed the proportions of a formidable insurrection, and proves to have been a well-organised movement amongst the operatives of the leading lines. The strikers are joined by thousands of the lower orders and many workmen of other trades who have been of late completely demoralised by the slackness of work throughout the States, and the rioters have succeeded in many cases in utterly defeating the troops, and committing robberies and wanton destruction of property. The strike first assumed a serious aspect last week, when the militia of West Virginia declared their sympathy with the strikers, and the Governor had to appeal to President Hayes for State aid. On the 19th inst. the strike extended to the Pennsylvania Railway, and the strikers took possession of the Pittsburg Terminus and blockaded the line: while on the Ohio and Baltimore line the strikers blockaded the line at Cumberland, the troops having gained possession of the Martinsburg Terminus. At Philadelphia the next day the terminus of the Pennsylvania Railway was taken possession of by a strong body of police—a wise precautionary measure, as on Saturday the strike extended until the three chief railways—the Pennsylvania, the Erie, and the Baltimore and Ohio—were completely blockaded, as well as several Western lines. At Baltimore, the Governor having ordered two of the Maryland regiments to assemble at Camden Station, to be despatched up the line, a mob of 10,000 men collected and attacked the soldiers, and set fire to the station.

The troops fired on the mob in reply, and it was thought prudent to retain them in the city, which, owing to the energetic measures adopted by the Governor, has since been restored to comparative quietude, the mob being kept in order by reinforcements of troops, and the arrival of an ironclad, and the garrison at Fort M'Henry, which dominates the city.

The entire military force of Pennsylvania was now ordered under arms; but in many cases the militia, sympathising with the rioters, refused to respond, and all the available State troops were accordingly brought into requisition. A detachment was despatched from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, and, the Sheriff heading them, advanced towards the rioters with warrants for the arrest of the ringleaders. The rioters attacked the troops and killed the sheriff, upon which the troops opened fire. The mob, then numbering some 10,000, took possession of the heights, showered stones upon the troops, and forced them into the locomotive round-house. Here the unfortunate soldiers had to stand a regular siege until next day, when the mob setting fire to railway cars, and pushing them against the round-house, ignited the building. The soldiers then retreated, and, becoming disorganised, fairly took to flight, leaving fifteen dead and wounded colleagues, while the mob gave itself up to unlimited license, and roamed about the streets burning, destroying, and plundering ad libitum. Every building containing arms was ransacked; hotels were sacked; a hundred and twenty-five locomotives were destroyed, and over 1,000 cars burnt, many being laden with corn and petroleum. At length the mob became weary of plundering, and the respectable citizens, forming themselves into a Vigilance Committee, succeeded in restoring order, which has since been maintained.

The strike, however, continued to spread, the operatives of the New York Central joined the movement, and at Philadelphia there were various attacks upon the station, which, however, the police succeeded in repulsing. At Harrisburg and various other places the rioters held their ground, but there was no repetition of the Pittsburg outrages. At New York there has naturally been great excitement, business has been almost suspended, and great agitation has been caused by several meetings held to sympathise with the strikers. Farther north, at Buffalo and Lake Shore, there have been conflicts between the strikers and the troops, while the agitation has reached as far as San Francisco, where the "working men," to the number of 10,000, held an anti-Chinese meeting, and attempted a general massacre and burning of the Chinese quarters, but were fortunately overpowered by the police. The whole Eastern system of railways (New England excepted) is completely disorganised, and fears are entertained of a failure of the food supplies.

In the mean time the Government is doing its utmost to check the insurrection—for such we can only call it. All the available troops have been concentrated in the Atlantic States, under General Hancock at Philadelphia and General Pope at St. Louis. The President has issued proclamations to the rioters, and has notified to the Militia of all States to apply to the War Office for orders. By the latest news the situation is improved, lawlessness is under control, and the Cabinet consider that the crisis has passed. The Pennsylvania Railway were able on Wednesday partly to resume their traffic, but announced their intention of resisting the strikers' demands to the last. Several other companies, however, have effected a compromise.

INDIA.——The famine reports from Madras are exceedingly gloomy this week, as the rain has almost entirely ceased, and the situation is regarded as exceedingly critical, a second year of scarcity being now apprehended in Madras and Mysore. The mortality in the Relief Camps is already very great, and should the rain not fall it will increase enormously. In Bombay also there has been a break in the rains.

THE TRANSVAAL.——The news hence is very satisfactory, and the effect on the natives by the review of the British troops at Pretoria on the Queen's birthday is said to have been exceedingly good. Secocoeni has submitted to the Colonial Government, but it is said that the Zulu King, Cetywayo, is annoyed at the annexation, and that missionaries and natives are taking refuge in Natal. Ex-President Burgers attended Sir Bartle Frere's ball in honour of the Queen's birthday at Cape Town.

THE COURT

THE Queen, the Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold are now in the Isle of Wight. They will remain at Osborne for about a month, and will then go to Balmoral as usual to spend the autumn. Her Majesty, the Princess and the Prince, were present at the service performed at Osborne on Sunday morning, and in the evening the Rev. George and Mrs. Prothero dined with the Queen. Rear-Admiral Sir Edmund Commerell has also dined with Her Majesty, and the Queen has taken her usual walks and drives, while Prince Leopold has been yachting in the Alberta.—The Queen will give 100*l*. towards the restoration of St. Alban's Abbey. Her Majesty does not usually contribute to church restorations, but makes this exception in consequence of the great antiquarian and historical interest attached to the Abbey. The Queen will also subscribe 50*l*. towards the expenses of the Social Science Congress at Aberdeen in September.

The Prince of Wales on Saturday went with his children Prince George and Princess Louise to Lady Holland's garden-party. On Monday morning the Prince went down to Chislehurst to see the ex-Empress Eugénie, and in the afternoon the Prince and Princess visited the Duchess of Cambridge. On Wednesday the Prince and Princess again visited the Duchess of Cambridge and the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz. The Prince and Princess will spend Goodwood week with the Duke and Duchess of Richmond and Gordon, and afterwards intend taking a cruise in the Royal yacht, their children accompanying them.—The attack of continued fever from which Prince Albert Victor has been suffering is not very severe. Saturday last was the 14th day of the Prince's illness, and he is going on satisfactorily.

The Princess Louise was at Lady Holland's garden party on Saturday. The Princess and the Marquis of Lorne have since been staying with Frances Countess Waldegrave and Lord Carlingford at Strawberry Hill.—To-day (Saturday) Princess Christian will lay the corner stone of the new workshops belonging to the Home for Little Boys, and Prince Christian will preside at the luncheon.

CHURCH NEWS

THE NEW BISHOP OF ROCHESTER.——Dr. A. W. Thorold, late Vicar of St. Pancras, was consecrated to his new office on Wednesday last, in Westminster Abbey, in presence of an immense congregation. The ceremony was performed by the Primate, assisted by the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of Winchester, Ely, Guildford, Durham, St. David's, Oxford, London, and St. Albans, the two last mentioned acting as the presenting Bishops. Dean Stanley and nearly the whole of the Abbey clergy were also present. The preacher was the Rev. Sir Emilius Bayley, Bart., who, taking his text from 1 Tim. iv. 16., sketched the history and character of the Christian Ministry, and repudiated the commonly-received doctrine of Apostolical Succession, contending that the Episcopate consisting not in a succession of forms, but in faith and doctrine.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS which will be held at Croydon, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury, will commence on the 9th of October with a special opening service and a sermon by the Rev. Professor Lightfoot; and the closing sermon on the 13th will be by the Rev. Canon Farrar. Amongst the most interesting subjects set down for discussion, are "Mahomedanism in relation to Christianity;" "Christian faith and sceptical culture in their relative bearings on practical life;" "The best means of promoting united action and mutual toleration between different Schools of Thought within the Church;" "Representative Assemblies of the Church of England;" "The readjustments, if any, desirable in the relations of Church and State;" "The mutual relations between the Church and Nonconformity;" "The Church in relation to Trades Union;" "The best methods of diffusing Biblical and Theological Knowledge;" "The Church in relation to Public Amusements;" and "The Observance of the Lord's Day."

VARIOUS.——At the Exeter Hall meeting held last week in opposition to Auricular Confession, Sir T. Chambers, M.P., in moving that an address be presented to the Queen, said that nothing could be more convincing of the reality of our danger than the fact that in twenty years we had passed from a state of things in which one clergyman proposed the practice of Confession, to one made conspicuous by the adhesion of 700 "priests" to the doctrines of such a work as that published for the benefit of the Holy Cross Society. The resolution was adopted, and also another proposed by Mr. Newdegate, M.P., calling on the Bishops to use their authority and influence for the repression of the practice, and a third inviting all loyal Churchmen to assist the Church Association. At a meeting of the Holborn Branch of the English Church Union the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie, who presided, defended the publication of "The Priest in Absolution," by the Holy Cross Society, which he said had been undertaken to limit rather than extend its circulation. It made him quite indignant to think that persons who knew nothing about what they were speaking should dare to question the purity of those who taught and practised confession. Resolutions were passed, approving of the firm action of the Society, and regretting that the Bishops should have introduced the subject in the House of Lords without first consulting their clergy.—The various Committees of the Wesleyan Conference at Bristol have been very busy during the week preparing reports on all sorts of subjects to be laid before the Congress as soon as its session commences.—The new Church of St. John's, Copthorn, near Three Bridges, was last week opened by the Bishop of Chichester, who preached an eloquent sermon to a large congregation, amongst whom were most of the local clergy. The church, which is a Gothic structure designed by Mr. Brock, is the gift of Lady Lampson, and stands upon freehold land presented by Sir Curtis Lampson, Bart.

PARLIAMENT

On Monday night the House of Commons was drawn together in large numbers by the prospect of varying interest in the proceedings. In the first place there was the expectation of an important statement in respect of the war. Rumours which had reached the dignity of semi-official statements pointed to the dispatch to the East of a large number of troops. What was the exact destination of this force every one was inquiring, and the House of Commons was looked to as the place where the mystery might be settled. In fact, Mr. Callan had given notice of his intention to question the Government. He rose in due course, and received a severe snub, Mr. Bourke informing him that the leader of the Opposition had been in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had given notice of his intention to put a similar question. The questions on the paper being disposed of, the Marquis of Hartington drew from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the brief, but satisfactory, statement that the force was simply destined to bring up to their full complement the Mediterranean garrisons.

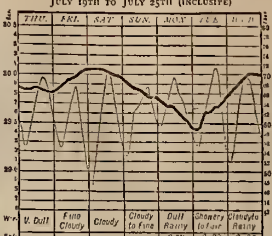
After this there was the question of Government taking over Tuesdays and Wednesdays throughout the Session. Mr. Monk took this opportunity of making a speech on an amendment which he had placed on the paper, and his purpose being effected when the speech was delivered he did not propose to push it to a division. Mr. Parnell, however, was not to be refused the satisfaction of dividing. He accordingly made a long speech, and was followed by Mr. O'Donnell, who maundered along—the word, though not Parliamentary, most exactly describes his peculiar manner of oratorical progression—amid repeated interruptions. When he sat down Mr. Chaplin, whose gift of saying bitter things was displayed on a well-known occasion, interposed, and took the opportunity of declaring that there were certain members of the House of Commons who displayed a stubborn insensibility to every sentiment and feeling by which gentlemen in the House were guided. This of course shocked the tender sensibilities of Mr. Parnell and Mr. Biggar who, jumping up together, appealed to the Speaker to reprimand Mr. Chaplin. Mr. Chaplin had, however, so turned his words that though bitter they were not a breach of order, and so the Speaker ruled, whilst the house by repeated and prolonged cheering endorsed their application to Mr. Parnell, Mr. Biggar, and Mr. O'Donnell.

After this came on the third course at the spicy banquet. After Lord Beaconsfield's explanation in the House of Lords of the circumstances under which he had promoted Mr. Pigott, it was felt necessary to move in the House of Commons, and Sir Walter Barttelot was found a willing instrument for bringing forward a motion rescinding the vote of censure. The debate which followed was long, but not animated. The only interest pertaining to it lay in the explanations which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave of his personal communications on the subject with Lord Beaconsfield, and which, as he himself confessed, showed a considerable amount of incompleteness. At one time there was a threat of dividing the House; but finally milder counsels prevailed, and amid grateful cheering from the Ministerialists the vote of censure was unanimously rescinded.

On Tuesday night there began a scene which culminated on Wednesday in one of the most remarkable episodes witnessed in the House of Commons since Feargus O'Connor ate the Speaker's chop and assaulted Lord John Russell. It began on the South Africa Bill, in which Messrs. Parnell and Co. have been pleased to take a lively interest. Mr. O'Donnell, fired with a noble envy of the fame which has pursued Mr. Biggar since he made his four hours' speech, undertook to emulate him, and to that end brought down some Blue Books and odd copies of journals said to be the Spectator, a journal which is favoured by occasional contributions from the hon. member for Dungarvan. The House naturally was not attracted by the prospect before it, and with one accord left Mr. O'Donnell to the hearing of his compatriots. Even this, however, failed him, only Mr. Parnell steadily sitting throughout the speech. Mr. Biggar came in later, and observing the state of things determined to punish hon. members by having a "count." This he did twice in rapid succession, bringing members in from distant parts of the House. Then Major O'Gorman, who had also been conspicuous by his absence, moved two "counts" in succession, the latter of which the Speaker declined to take notice of. All this led up to the scene of Wednesday. The South Africa Bill was in Committee again when Mr. O'Donnell appeared, and moved to report progress. Mr. Jenkins, who on Saturday was threatened by Mr. Parnell with the defection of Home Rule votes in Dundee, was careful to show himself in connection with the Irish members, and made a speech which had many points of resemblance with that delivered by Mr. O'Donnell the previous night. Mr. Monk expressing his impatience at the continuance of it roused Mr. Jenkins's ire, and calling forth from Mr. Monk the declaration that he was abusing the forms of the House, Mr. Jenkins moved that the words be taken down. After this the deluge. Mr. Parnell broke forth and made use of expressions which were three several times moved to be taken down, twice by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and once by the Speaker. Finally, Mr. Parnell having first been heard in his defence, verdict was passed upon him that he had been guilty of contempt of the House, a rule which the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Thursday moved should be made absolute. In the mean time, if so unimportant a thing as business may be mentioned, it may be said that the preamble of the South Africa Bill was agreed to, and the Committee reached the first clause.

WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

JULY 19TH TO JULY 25TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather during this period of seven days has again been divided into two distinct portions, the latter part of last week and Sunday having been dry, but cloudy, while rain has fallen on each day since Sunday, as will be seen by referring to the diagram. The barometer, after rising from Thursday night, the 19th instant, to Saturday morning, the 21st instant, fell steadily from the latter time until Tuesday morning, the 24th instant, when it rose briskly till Wednesday evening last, and then it again began to fall. Although the daily range of temperature is clearly shown each day, its variations have been small for the time of year. The wind has remained between south and west, and has been very moderate in force. The barometer was highest (30·05 inches) on Saturday, the 21st instant; lowest (29·43 inches) on Tuesday, the 24th instant; range, 0·62 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (71°) on Tuesday, the 24th instant; lowest (47°) on Saturday, the 21st instant; range, 24°. Rainfall: The total fall was 0·42 inch, on three days; greatest fall, 0·30 inch, on Monday, the 23rd instant. On Thursday morning, the 26th instant, the barometer was falling briskly. Nearly two-tenths of an inch of rain had fallen in the night, and the sky was still very cloudy.

THEATRES

MR. HOLLINGSHEAD'S extensive and varied programme of French performances is at length exhausted, and on Monday next the regular company of the GAIETY, reinforced by the return of Miss E. Farren, who has been suffering from a long and serious illness, will resume their place upon the Gaiety stage. During the present week M. Parade and his associates have appeared in two pieces which, though familiar enough to Parisian audiences, have, we believe, not been seen before in London, either in their original shape or in the guise of an English adaptation. The first and most important of these is MM. Barrière and Thiboust's Aux Crochets d'un Gendre, a comedy of sterling merit, though somewhat old-fashioned in tone and structure. Here we have neither the licentious extravagance of MM. Meilhac and Halévy, nor the ethical paradoxes of M. Alexandre Dumas. To present life as it is, though with the colouring necessary to render it effective on the stage; to satirise human feelings, to bring into relief recognisable traits of character, and to associate these with enough in the way of story to give occasion for three or four acts—such were the principal objects of the writers of French comedy before metaphysics and moral problems were introduced to the stage by M. Alexandre Dumas, or the ingenious absurdities of the Palais Royal had found an echo in theatres with more dignified associations. To this school MM. Barrière and Thiboust's piece, though no older than the year 1864, when it was brought out at the Gymnase, is distinctly referable. It is an amusing satire upon the tyranny of needy relations and the abuses of hospitality, as exemplified in the experiences of an unfortunate son-in-law who, having received his wife's family into his house from motives of compassion, finds himself the object of a subtle kind of persecution arising chiefly from his ruined father-in-law's dignified humility and overpowering sense of personal worth. In this part, which combines the shiftiness of Micawber with the picturesque deportment of Turveydrop, with the qualities already indicated, M. Parade, who is the original representative of the character, exhibits all the resources of his art. When he draws from his unlucky speculations in cotton inferences highly favourable to his own claims to the esteem and affection of his fellow men, or resents the bounty which he is nevertheless eager to accept, or makes the very prosperity of his benefactor a text for disparaging comparisons—the exaggeration of the portrait never wholly obscures its fundamental truth, which lies in the ingenuity of men in discovering excuses for self-admiration. The comedietta entitled Suzanne et les Deux Vieillards, produced by way of afterpiece, is a trifle of the same school. Two old friends who are past the prime of life agree that it is expedient in the interests of an orphan girl whom they have brought up and educated that one or other should marry her. The question is which shall be the happy man. As neither is inclined to assume so serious a responsibility each is at first rather anxious to extol the claims of his rival than to be eloquent upon his own merits. Meanwhile the young lady, anxious not to give offence or to appear insensible to obligations, yet decidedly inclined to prefer a youthful nephew to whom she is secretly attached, resorts to an ingenious stratagem. By feigning passion for one of her benefactors she insensibly arouses first the self-esteem and then the jealousy of the other, until each is glad by way of compromise to bestow the young lady on the real object of her choice. There is genuine comedy and abundant humour in the situation and dialogue of this little piece, which derives no small assistance from the strongly-marked yet essentially-refined characterisation of M. Michel as one of the elderly admirers; while Mdlle. Massin sustains with the same delicacy and spirit, though, unfortunately, not with the same youthful grace as heretofore, the part of Suzanne, originally performed by her when this piece, which is from the pen of M. Henri Meilhac, was produced at the Vaudeville nine years ago.

A morning performance of The Merchant of Venice given at the GLOBE Theatre last week served to introduce to the public a young lady named Denman, who is understood to have been studying the art of acting under the guidance of Mr. Ryder. The character chosen for this purpose was that of Portia, a trying part even for an experienced actress. Unfortunately it proved to be wholly beyond the reach of the young lady who, prompted by her own aspirations, or by the ill-advised counsel of friends, was tempted to show us how Portia may be divested of all poetical charm by a formal and monotonous delivery of lines, and an absence of that varied and appropriate action which is hardly less important than the elocutionary graces.

The season at the LYCEUM will terminate this (Saturday) evening and on Monday Mr. Irving will reappear in Hamlet. This will be the last performance of this actor in London until December next.

The new spectacular drama in rehearsal at DRURY LANE is from the pen of Mr. W. G. Wills who, following in the footsteps of the late Mr. Halliday, has adopted a novel of Sir Walter Scott. The title of the play, which will be produced on the reopening of the theatre on the 22nd of September, is England in the Days of Charles the Second; the story is taken from "Peveril of the Peak."

THE WESTMINSTER AQUARIUM.——"Pongo," the only live gorilla ever brought to Europe, is now being exhibited at the Royal Aquarium. We gave an illustration of him in our issue for October 21, 1876 (No. 360), together with a full account of his purchase in the Gaboon Country. Pongo is now about three feet high, and has a very grave face, not unlike that of a negro. He uses his fore feet as hands, but always walks on all fours. He goes through certain tricks on the trapeze, eats food like a man, and expresses a decided taste for wine and beer. He is now about three years old—a mere infant for a gorilla, and as such plays like a child, with a chimpanzee and his dog "Flock."

MISS GLYN'S SHAKSPERIAN READINGS at 13, Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, continue to attract full and appreciative audiences, and deservedly so, for no one can listen to her without admiring the genius of the actress, and being made aware of hitherto unnoticed beauties in the author. The last of the present series will be given on Tuesday evening next, when King John is the play chosen for interpretation. We understand that Miss Glyn intends giving a second series of Shakespearian Readings, which will commence early in August.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——It is evident that Huntingdon is destined to take first rank among the meetings which do not attempt to vie with Epsom, Ascot, Goodwood, and Newmarket. The gathering hard by the old Cromwellian town during the week has been even more successful than its predecessors, a good class of animals competing for the different stakes, good finishes, especially on the first day, being frequent, and "good company" being present to witness the proceedings.

CRICKET.——The star of the Home Counties as represented by Kent and Surrey has certainly been in the ascendant during the present season, Surrey having done more than recall the memory of her former cricketing glories. On Saturday last she scored another victory, no less a celebrated team than that of Notts succumbing to the batting and bowling of the men of the Oval. On the first hand Surrey put together a nice round total of 250, to which Mr. Lucas contributed 115; and the Notts men only realising 97 had to follow their innings. They, however, ran up 247, the 64 of Wild being the best score, and Surrey lost 7 wickets before the balance was rubbed off; but "'Twas a glorious victory."—Flushed with success, the Surrey men were at The Mote, Maidstone, on Monday last to tackle the Men of Kent and Kentish men, who have also revived this season the cricketing fame of the hop county. But the tide still ran in favour of the South Londoners, who polished off their opponents by an innings and 99 runs. There was tall scoring on the part of the conquerors, Mr. Lucas, who is in full batting bloom, making another large score, 110, while that steady old hand Jupp marked 93.—Previous "form" cannot be always counted on in cricket, for if it could we should have few matches; but "on paper" Derbyshire was bound to beat Hampshire, and so it did at Derby this week, the county of trout, grayling, and water cures beating the Southrons by an innings and 113 runs. Platts, for Derbyshire, made the highest score in the game, 115 being his total.—Essex, famous for calves and ague, is working hard to make a show in the cricket world, but the match with the M.C.C. was rather a damper, the London Club winning by 10 wickets. N.B. Rylott for M.C.C. took 6 East Saxon wickets for 33 runs, and 3 of the wickets fell to 3 consecutive balls. It was hardly to be wondered at that the Essex batsmen looked a little amazed; but, as Dr. Lynn says, "That's how it's done." It was done, too, in a somewhat similar—may we say "more similar?"—manner in the recent match between the United South of England Eleven v. Eighteen of Sefton, wherein for the South Midwinter took 5 wickets for 7 runs, and G. F. Grace 3 for 5 runs: and yet they say that the bat is superior to the ball in modern cricket! The I Zingari seem to be losing their cunning to let the "School of Gunnery" mark 491 against their 104 in the first innings.

SWIMMING.——The Challenge Cup for Amateurs, subscribed for by the members of the Houses of Lords and Commons, and competed for on Monday last under the auspices of the London Swimming Club, produced a very good competition. The course was from Putney to Westminster Bridge, a distance of about five miles and a half. There were no less than thirty-two entries, and all started. Mr. Davenport, the captain of the Ilex Swimming Club, who evidently had the race in hand from the start, was the winner, accomplishing the distance in 1 h. 13 min. 20 sec.; Mr. Fearn, of Putney, being second, fifty yards behind Mr. Davenport.

"WAITING FOR THE VERDICT"

A SPEAKING TELEGRAPH

In the whole range of science it would be difficult to find two branches which have yielded such marvellous results as spectroscopic analysis and electricity. From the simple act of Newton's decomposition of solar light by a prism of glass has sprung the spectroscope, and all the store of information we have since gained concerning the physical constituents of heavenly bodies. Similarly, from one simple fact observed by ancients and moderns, that a piece of rubbed amber has power to attract certain light bodies toward it, has been elaborated the great system of electric science, with its wonderful practical outcome—the electric telegraph. The small beginnings from which both these sciences have sprung, and their recent sudden growth, make, indeed, almost every fact connected with them seem to us marvellous. The electric telegraph, with its thousand-fold applications known only to those who specially study the subject, is almost entirely the growth of the last fifty years. In that time hundreds of instruments have been developed, and lived, and passed again out of existence, or to that Limbo of Forgotten Things—the Museum of the Patent Office. Others more fitting and ingenious have taken their places, and so the process of evolution has gone on, and still goes on. There is no abatement of electric novelties. Invention is constantly aiming at greater delicacy and speed of sending messages. And so within the last few years we have seen the successful operation of the duplex system of sending, not only on overland wires, both in Europe and America, but on long submarine cables. By this method a telegraph wire is made to speak as it were with two tongues. It carries two messages at once in opposite directions, so that the clerk at either end of the wire can be both sending and receiving a message at the same time. Besides the duplex system, another promising development has been going on—namely, the invention and perfecting of telephones for transmitting musical notes by electricity, and the applications of this power to the transmission of more than one separate message along a wire in the same direction at once. For example, by the telephones of Gray and La Cour as many as four, eight, or even sixteen messages may be sent along a wire at once, and all made separately audible as musical tones at the station receiving the message. Wonderful as this may appear, however, and beautiful as the apparatus certainly is, the speaking telegraph of Professor Bell is more wonderful still. This telephone actually reproduces the human speech. The sender, or person sending the message, speaks into the apparatus in a loud voice, as if he spoke into the mouth of a speaking-trumpet, and the receiver, with his ear placed at the receiving instrument, hears the sender speaking, although they may be many miles apart. It is easy to see how such an instrument as this will be made practically useful. For domestic communication where pneumatic tubes are unsuitable, for business and even private correspondence, for reports of lectures and speeches, or other purposes, where the distance of transmission is not too great, it will be specially fit. It has the advantage of speed over the ordinary modes of telegraphing. In these each letter of a word is signalled by, on an average, three distinct signals. But by the articulating telephone a whole word is transmitted in the act of uttering it.

Mr. Graham Bell, the inventor of this ingenious instrument, is a native of Edinburgh, and now a naturalised citizen of the United States. He is a Professor in Boston University. In December of last year he patented his telephone in England. It is small, and, to those versed in electric science, exquisitely simple. It consists of two pieces of apparatus, a transmitter for sending the sound message, and a receiver for receiving it. The transmitter consists of a strong horseshoe magnet with silk-covered wire wound round each of the poles. This wire is connected to the telegraph line, so as to be "in circuit" with it. If, then, electricity should be generated in this wire it will flow into the line, and proceed to the distant station; and Mr. Bell contrives that it shall be generated by the sound to be conveyed. For this purpose he employs a short speaking-pipe or cavity, closed by a membrane. When a sound is produced close to this open pipe, the air within it takes up the vibrations, and communicates them to the membrane. The air is like a delicate spring in vibration, and each air particle changes its velocity with the sound produced. The membrane, in the same way, vibrates to and fro in keeping with the sound. The pitch and loudness of a sound, of course, depend on the number of air vibrations per second, and their amplitude or swing. The membrane is so delicately adjusted that it is capable of following all changes of tone, and vibrating synchronously. This membrane carries a small thin piece of soft iron glued to its surface, and brought very near to the poles of the horse-shoe magnet. In short, it forms the armature of the poles, but does not touch them. It is designed to vibrate, with the membrane, in close proximity to the poles. The vibration of this armature induces currents of electricity in the silk-covered wire round the poles. These currents vary in strength synchronously with the vibrations of the magnet, and the air. In this way the sounds produced at the mouth of the pipe generate currents of electricity in the line—currents whose strength varies with the nature of the sound.

These currents traverse the line to the distant station, and then pass through the receiver. The receiver consists of a hollow cylindrical coil of silk-covered wire encased in soft iron. The mouth of the cylinder is half closed by a thin disc of soft iron, whose edge is free to vibrate over the mouth. When the current passes through the coils, the cylinder becomes magnetic, and attracts the edge of the disc, which starts into audible vibration. These vibrations are a reproduction of the vibrations of the armature and the membrane of the transmitter, and they reproduce the original sounds. All the variations of human speech, and the harmonies of musical instruments may be transmitted for miles by this simple but ingenious contrivance. Sir William Thomson, the highest living authority on electrical matters, in his address to the physical section of the British Association last year, thus gave his experience of it at the Centennial Exhibition, Philadelphia. "In the Canadian Department, I heard 'To be or not to be . . . . there's the rub,' through an electric wire; but scorning monosyllables, the electric articulation rose to higher flights, and gave me passages taken at random from the New York newspapers. 'S.S. Cox has arrived' (I failed to make out the S.S. Cox); 'the City of New York;' 'Senator Morton;' 'the Senate has resolved to print a thousand extra copies;' 'the Americans in London have resolved to celebrate the coming Fourth of July.' All this my own ears heard spoken to me with unmistakeable distinctness by the then circular disc armature of just such another little electro-magnet as this I hold in my hand. The words were shouted with a clear loud voice by my colleague judge at the far end of the telegraph wire." Since then Professor Bell has been perfecting his apparatus, and has achieved even more remarkable success. At a lecture which he delivered upon the instrument at Salem, eighteen miles from Boston, a reporter of the Boston Daily Globe sent a verbal report of the lecture by telephone to his office. Those receiving the message at Boston even heard the applause of the audience who attended the lecture. From the platform, Mr. Bell conversed with Mr. Watson, his associate at Boston. The latter then sent a telegraph message in musical notes, and also a tune played from an organ, which were both distinctly heard by the audience. On being asked for a song, Watson complied with "Auld Lang Syne," and finally made a speech which was heartily applauded. Mr. Watson returned thanks, and the meeting, we are told, sang the "Star Spangled Banner" in company with the people collected at Boston.

In view of these undoubted facts we may anticipate a useful career for the articulating telephone, the last and crowning marvel of the electric telegraph.

"Though Broken, Brave," by E. A. Ryder, author of "The Wheel of Fortune," &c. (3 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—We hardly think that plot is a strong point with Mr. Ryder, but his story deserves favourable mention on the score of much good and careful work in the way of character-drawing, and the many really clever scenes we come upon in the course of it. The character who may, perhaps, be considered the central figure in the piece, the hard-hearted, close-fisted, grasping, and really knavish manufacturer, who, on the strength of his own reiterated assertions that "he's nowt if he's not honest," and that "honesty's th' rule wi' him," comes to be universally known among his fellow-citizens as "Honest John Burvil," is a type which, coarse and even exaggerated as it may seem, would yet, we believe, be admitted as true to nature by any one acquainted with the great towns of the North. But surely there is not a little improbability in the success of the fraudulent coup by which "honest John" manages to transfer to himself the bulk of the property of his partner and former patron, old Tom Garford. An old man of business, broken as he might be in health, would hardly sign deeds vitally affecting the fortunes of his family without reading them, in blind reliance on the assurance of his partner—originally only a mill-hand in his works—that they had been drawn up in strict adherence with the agreement come to between them. John Burvil's subsequent clumsy attempts to transform himself by means of his ill-gotten wealth into a country gentleman, the systematic snubbings he receives at the hands of Arthur and Felicia Hardaker, the aristocratic nephew and niece he has adopted after driving from him his only son, and the keen misery which the expenditure needful in his new position causes to his soul, well as he can afford it, are described graphically enough. But a more attractive picture is that of that Garford family whom his villany has brought down in the world. Of the three brothers Dacre, Thomas Joseph, and Mark, the last, though morally the most estimable—it is he, we take it, who gives its title to the book—is perhaps artistically the least effective; but Dacre's dilettanteism and harmless vanity, together with the real goodness of heart and generosity which so endear him to his younger brother, and the hypochondriacal affectations of Thomas Joseph,—whose pleasure it is to persuade himself and others that he, who cannot endure from hearty meal to hearty meal without occasional "snacks," and much brandy and soda-water, is a miserable invalid, whose appetite has completely deserted him—are very naturally and very amusingly portrayed. In Arthur Hardaker, again, we have a very fairly executed specimen of the well-intentioned spendthrift, and, little as he can be approved of, we are not without sympathy for him in the utter shipwreck he ultimately makes of health and happiness. Mr. Ryder seems to succeed least with his ladies. The passionate and wilful Felicia is so unattractive that we can hardly bring ourselves to pity her in her miserable marriage, and though Mary Garford is no doubt as sweet and loveable as she is described as being, she continues throughout quite in the background. However, as the novel is concerned a great deal more with the outer life of men than with love-making—a welcome change now and then—the author's comparative failure with his heroines is of less importance, and does not affect our estimate of the book as a fresh, well-written, and sufficiently, if not powerfully, interesting story.

"Alix Fairford," by John Dangerfield, author of "Grace Tolmar," &c. (2 vols.: Sampson Low, Marston and Co.).—This is a book of much thoughtfulness and power, with numerous happy touches and turns of expression revealing the artist's hand. It appears from the preface that an abridged version of the story, published in the New Quarterly Magazine, was handled very severely in "the chief organ of Women's Rights in this country"—whatever journal may be thus referred to—on the score of the extravagant patience and submission which the heroine is made to display towards her coarse and brutal husband. Nor, were it Mr. Dangerfield's intention to hold up Alix's conduct herein as a model for imitation, with all our admiration for the book, should we on moral grounds think the censure undeserved, for it cannot be held a part of wifely duty to remain with a husband whom she does not love, and cannot love, who not only treats her with outrage and insult, but in whose hands, she is informed on good authority, when in one of his drunken furies her very life is not safe. But there is no need to suppose that the author had any such intention; rather, he says, it was his design "to show the worthiness and inherent nobility in a woman, with perhaps a mistaken ideal of human life, but strong and upright in her endeavour to act up to her own standard." Mr. Dangerfield is at pains to bring out all those traits in Alix Fairford's character which impel her towards the rôle which, in spite of remonstrances, she persists in playing out to the end—to show how, by the influence of race, training, and association, she had developed into "a pure, guileless, very candid, very single and simple nature, always contented to be guided, and happy in being submissive to rule and precedent, and habit and authority." But this patient and ready submission is only irritating to the mean, ignoble, and brutal nature of Gerald Consett, the cousin who has cheated Alix into marrying him, seeking to save himself from ruin by the help of her fortune, and whose complete unworthiness cannot be long hid after matrimony, because in all her compliances "there was a quiet reserve of independence which he did not at all like," she fails in that subservience to him which he exacted from every one in his power, and does not seem to quail before his anger. So with the ingenuity of a fiend, and the cowardly ferocity of the "rough" that at heart he is, he sets himself to humiliate her, and "break her spirit," but the process, from which poor Alix barely escapes with life, we cannot enter upon here. The pretty, frivolous, yet, after a fashion, clever flirt, Mrs. Jocelyn, is as a "character-study" almost on a par with Alix herself and her husband. Her "word-duel" with Henry Consett as she drives him home in her pony-carriage in the early dusk of an autumn evening, and at last, in spite of his cunning of fence, succeeds in surprising the secret he is so anxious should be kept hidden, is a really masterly piece of work of its kind. But we must not attempt to enumerate the scenes of special excellence in a work well deserving the attention even of fastidious novel-readers.

"Kilcorran," by the Hon. Mrs. Fetherstonhaugh (2 vols.: Bentley).—This is a pretty story, and told with freshness of tone and feeling, hackneyed as are both its theme and its dramatis personæ. Old acquaintances by this time are the frank, high-spirited girl, hardly more than a child either in years or in feeling, and the "world-worn, world-weary" man, whose passions are strong, and whose life has been reckless, nearly twice her own age, who is at first amused with her as a piquante child, and then comes to find that she is and must remain the one real love of his life. And readers versed in the complications of fiction will not be surprised to learn that Neal Trench and Lillis Fane have no business to fall in love with each other at all, the affections of both being already pledged elsewhere. How the author deals with the situation indicated we may leave readers to find out. We must say, however, that she seems to us to preach a questionable moral doctrine in bidding us admire Lil's heroism and self-sacrifice in putting aside from her the temptation of Neal Trench's love, even after he is free to offer it, and resolving at all costs to be true to her word, and give her hand to the man to whom she has promised it, knowing all the time that she does not love him as a wife should love her husband, and does thus love another man. It is, of course, no light matter to break a promise, but it may be more honourable and more honest to break it altogether, than to keep it in sound and break it in sense. But the book, pretty as we have said that it is, is too slight to be used as a vehicle for discussing a question of morals. Mrs. Fetherstonhaugh would seem a mighty huntress, well "posted up" in the talk of the stable and the hunting-field, and writing on all such matters con amore. But, with all deference to her better judgment, would a journey of even thirty-five miles have so completely exhausted the powers of such a mare as Kittane, that when at the end of it she takes her last fence her heart should break with the effort, and she should fall dead on the turf? Be this as it may, we can recommend the book as always readable, and often clever and amusing.

We have also received a new edition, in one volume, of Mr. John Saunders' "Israel Mort, Overman" (H. S. King and Co.), that "Story of the Mine" which was noticed at length in these columns a little more than a year ago.

HYÈRES

The charms of Hyères are but little known; few, indeed, know even where the town is, and confuse it with the islands with which it shares its name. There is little more connection than this between the two, for the town is on the main land, from which the islands are naturally cut off by the sea. Hyères is in one of the departments of Provence, called Var, on the Mediterranean coast, between Toulon and Cannes. It is situated a little way back from the sea, separated from it by some flat country. In allusion to the very common mistakes about its geographical position, it has been said by one who knows it well—

> Some said 'twas an island upon the blue ocean;
> Some thought 'twas a salt-marsh—delectable notion!

When we were there, some little time ago, the English colony was not large—three or four hundred people at the utmost; but we were very sociable, and were always having little tea-parties which, though not very exciting in themselves, made a merry finish to the day's occupations. Once a week our hotel "received;" that is to say, we all invited our friends to come in and spend the evening on a certain day in the week, and we generally entertained them with music and dancing. Everybody went away soon after ten o'clock, so that the invalids were not disturbed by these small weekly dissipations. Pic-nics formed a prominent feature in the amusements of the colony; an omnibus was chartered to convey the party to the place chosen, and on their arrival the hampers were unpacked, and their contents quickly went the way of all food, among much joking and fun. Then sketching parties were formed, or some of the party went to sleep in the hot sunshine, others for a walk, just as their inclinations prompted them, till the time came for returning home, when they mounted the omnibus and got back generally late for table d'hôte. Private theatricals, of course, were among our dissipations. Many were the rehearsals, and great the preparations. One room was turned into a manufactory of gold-paper ornaments, which were manufactured with much success by some persons whose services are not generally to be secured by the goldsmiths. In all rooms were to be found evidences of the theatrical fever, and the talk was of nothing but "the play," which at last came off to everybody's entire satisfaction, both actors and audience performing their several parts to perfection. Afterwards there was our amateur concert, which in its turn engrossed every one's thoughts, and kept us all in fear and trembling till the important day. Nothing was heard of then but practising, and the exciting events connected with the concert; such as, the conductor had disappeared, and no one knew where he was or when he was coming back; or that no room could be engaged large enough for the concert to take place in; fears that the music would not arrive from Marseilles in time, and so on. However, in spite of drawbacks, the concert at last went off triumphantly in a room placed at the disposal of the committee in the most courteous manner by the master of one of the hotels.

The town with its painted houses is very picturesque, and the palm trees and aloes growing here and there in the streets give an Oriental effect. There is a ruined castle on the hill, on one side of which the town seems to hang with its old narrow streets, which are certainly not pleasant to go through, but we were thoroughly repaid when we got up to the castle and looked out over the hills and valleys for miles round. The walks are lovely beyond description. Through the olive-gardens and the cork woods up Fenouillet, whence there is such an extensive view of the hazy blue Mediterranean, the Alpes Maritimes rising in broken ridges one after the other, whitened here and there with touches of snow; and down below, the flat valley running inland a little way, then separating into two arms, running east and west, till at last by a sudden curve of the shore the sea and the valley are brought together again. Or to the seashore, where the little waves play about on the sand and sea-weed, you can look back on the town with the old castle high above it, the palm trees waving in the breeze, and the low range of hills; or further to the Presqu'île de Gien, across the long bank of sand to the little village, just beyond which there is such a beautiful little boy, like an epitome of the South. We spent a whole day on the Presqu'Ile, and found fresh beauties at every step, till we could hardly tear ourselves away from it as the evening came on. The hills are clothed with such luxuriant vegetation, one sees so many plants one has never seen before (except in hot-houses) flourishing in the open air, the hills are so beautifully shaped, the sea so blue, the sunshine so glorious, everything makes one feel an intoxicating delight in the beauties Nature has showered around. One wanders about on the hill-sides among cypresses so dark and tall and straight, fig-trees, umbrella pines with their beautiful dome-shaped tops, palms with straight trunks and long feathery leaves, olives—who can describe the olives? their fantastic trunks, their leaves seeming to change colour as they rustle in the breeze; they are always green, the olives, a dull grey green, with a soft melancholy beauty about them as you look at a hill-side covered with them tossing their branches about in the wind. Orange and lemon trees with their yellow fruit brighten up the dark foliage with touches of brilliant colour.

Hyères is generally considered a dull place because it has no promenade, no regular balls and concerts, and it must be dull for any who require such stimulants to enjoyment; but for those who can carry their amusements with them, combined with a readiness to be pleased and a capacity for admiring the beauties which they will find ready laid out for them, there can hardly be a better place than our quiet little town on the Mediterranean.

THE BRITISH PARIAH

Who knows whence he comes, and whither he goes! More, who cares, except such as have unconsidered trifles lying about in public? The tramp is the pariah of British Brahminism, the outcast upon whom even the professional beggar turns his back. Not without reason. The wretched, cowering creature, with his furtive eyes, and half-abject, half-ferocious expression, is not a pleasant object. This, however, would not much affect his popularity with the mendicant class, whose philosophy has attained a perfect indifference to externals. But they feel no community of interest with the tramp. They have their own profession, such as it is, and faithfully they follow it, in spite of police persecutions. He, on the contrary, is a feckless wanderer, destitute of any regular vocation by which to earn a living. He will not settle down to comfortable beggary, and form a regular member of the fraternity monopolising that form of industry. It is true that he begs whenever an opportunity occurs, but he does so in an amateurish fashion, even as he filches on occasion. An erratic comet, whirling hither and thither as impulse prompts him, and without the slightest idea of the more refined arts of mendicancy, he has never yet learnt to pursue his profession according to the rules recognised by the begging brotherhood. They have certain laws, well understood among themselves, and certain definite bonds of union. By none of such restrictions will the tramp consent to be bound, and especially when they infringe upon his freedom of movement. Restless by nature, as if his veins were filled with quicksilver, fickle of purpose, indeterminate in carrying it out, careless about the decencies and comforts of life, indurated to the pangs of hunger, he has but one governing impulse,—the love of wandering. With his class, this forms a predominant instinct, having nothing in common with the desire for occasional travel felt by the rest of the community. The fancy picture of the fatigued tramp gazing up into the starlit sky from the hedgerow under which he rests, and wondering what it means, is touching, but imaginary. The poor wretch has quite lost the faculty of wonder. As for admiring the beauties of Nature, they form a sealed book written in an untranslateable cypher. The wild flowers that gem the hedgerows, and the sun that gives them life and colour are, because they are, even as he is a tramp because he is. It is an untrue picture to represent him as perpetually attempting to solve the problems of creation by the light of his dim intellect, and as constantly giving up the task in a state of hopeless puzzlement. This sort of sketch, when limned by the master-hand of Charles Dickens, was generally accepted as a faithful delineation of the working of degraded intellects, and has consequently been reproduced ad nauseam by less skilled masters. As a matter of fact, the tramp troubles himself about none of these things; the seeds of curiosity are dead within him. The universe forms no problem for such as he. The world and all its wonders are accepted as dry hard facts, like policemen and magistrates. There they are, law and order, the sky and the earth, life and death, and all he has to do is to make the best of them, without troubling his head about how they came into existence. Even when a bright comet flares across the dark vault of heaven the tramp regards the prodigy with unperturbed equanimity. It makes no change in his relations with creation, any more than a sky rocket, while as for the beauty of the flaming brand, his soul has been long blind on the æsthetic side. Hiding away from police ken in some wretched outhouse, and munching an eleemosynary crust or appropriated turnip, our friend is on good terms with the rats and mice who furtively peep at the intruder. Occasionally he may kick out at them, in a half-unconscious way, but as a rule he leaves them alone. After all, they are only claiming the freedom of roving, that blessed birthright which he and they enjoy in common. Besides, are not all men their enemies as well as his? Society has set its ban upon vermin generally, and the tramp therefore experiences a vague sense of sympathy with his playful companions. His position towards society, given in his own words as far as they may be printed—the tramp language abounds in too many embellishments for literal reproduction—is somewhat as follows:—

"Why don't I settle down? 'Cos I hates it wuss than bein' dead. It's all very fine you gentlefolks tellin' on me I ort to do this and that, but how'd you like if some'un wos to say you ort to go on the tramp? I likes wanderin' about, and you doesn't; that's wot it comes to, I think. A hard life? So's wot the wild beastesses 'ave, as I've heard tell, away in Africay and them parts. But they doesn't seem jolly when you puts em in cages, and no more'd I be, if I wasn't let go about. 'It's not respeckible?' P'raps not. That's as people think. If shoes and stockin's and plenty o' grub's respeckible, I ain't, and that's flat. And wot's more, I doesn't want to be, so why can't you leave a cove alone? You be as respeckible as you likes, and I shan't say ouffin' to you, not no ways. 'Tain't fair, seems to me, this everlastin' naggin' at a poor chap, 'cos he doesn't like just the things you gentlefolks likes. 'I steal sometimes?' Never said a truer word in your life. I generally does pick up things, when I has a chance, and I only wish as how the chance 'd cum a bit oftener. And does'nt you allays put me in quod, when you catches me at it? That's yer chance, and I don't grumble 'cos you jump at it. It's just like a sort o' game. Respeckible people leaves things about; I picks 'em up; if I ain't cotched, that's one for me; if I am, that's one for you. Then why doesn't you play fair, 'stead of bullying on me 'cos I does as the game allows? It's just heads you wins, tails I loses, and all round my hat I wears a green willow. If I'm ready to stand the shot, you're no call to screech as if you'd got bitten by a badger. 'Public moralty?' Wot's that got to do with me? I doesn't set up in that line of bizness. Suits some folks, and an unkimmon good thing they seems to make on it. Whenever I hears a chap torking 'bout public moralty, says I to myself, 'I wonders whether you was so blessed morril afore you made yer money.' If I goes into a shop—t'aint often, as you may guess—and buys a loaf of bread, or a bit of bakin, odds are I'll be cheated. 'The lawr purvides for sich cases?' Does it? P'raps so; t'aint for the likes of me to know. But ain't it odd, then, how reg'lar the game is carried on right under the noses of the perlice? Seems to me as how public moralty'd better take mind of these coves afore it comes down upon chaps like me.

"'My life ain't got no objeck?' There yer just wrong. It's all objeck from beginnin' to end. When I rouses up in the morning I've got to think where I'll find summat to eat, and that's a objeck you'd find precious botherin' to run a'ter. I'se been a'ter it ever since I was a babby, and I ain't cotched it altogether yet. Now and again I gets a jolly blow-out, but more times I goes to roost a'most as hungry as when I got up. It's allays a chivying on me, that objeck, till I often catches myself a wishing I hadn't got no stummick. I expecks that's why they makes them little flyin' chaps on tombstuns without any bodies. They lives up aloft, you see, and it wouldn't be much of a hevving if they had to be allays thinkin' about keepin' flesh on their bones. 'I'd get a good meal at the work'us?' I know all about that. Just bein' in quod, with not much better vittals. If I'se to be locked up, 'taint much matter to me whether it's in pris'n or the work'us. I ain't werry pertickler about what I eats and drinks. If I was, I wouldn't be a tramp, you sees. Wot I doesn't like and I won't have, if I can help it—and I generally does—is bein' shut up and made to work reg'lar. I likes dodgin' along; that's what I like, dodgin' along, and pickin' up ginerally. 'I'se lazy?' Well, doesn't seem like it, when a chap pads the hoof from mornin' to night a'most every day in his life. Expecks there's a precious lot of respeckible coves as 'd call it unkimmon hard work. You just try, Mister, and see how you likes it, before you calls me lazy agin. 'Don't I never feel a longin' for a home?' No, I doesn't, and that's flat. Wot's the good of a home, I'd like to know? If a chap has a crib of his own, he's jist sure to take a missus, and then there's rows and kids, and he's tied by the leg like a pig goin' to markit, and every one comes down heavy on the unfortnit cove if he goes in for ever such a bit of a lark. A home! Not if I knows it! That's jist givin' the perlice the hoffice where they may cotch a chap when he's wanted. And then on'y think of the missus a naggin' at one like a rusty sawr, and a lot o' squallin' brats, with their blessed bills allays wide open like so many young sparrers!

'The time will come when I'll want to be luv'd by sum 'un?' Will it? P'raps I ain't a almanick to tell wot's comin' off nex' year. But I doesn't feel that sort o'thing jist now, and so I'll wait till I does. Seems to me as how luv's precious dear at the price a chap has to pay for it. Tain't a reg'lar present, same as when folks gives me coppers, but just a sort of swop, and odds is a cove like me 'd get the wuss of the bargin. I'm game enuf to pocket as much luv as people likes to give me, but I ain't got none to hand over in return. We tramps doesn't live long, you sees. Now, you never cum'd across an old 'un, did you? I'se bin on the road ever since I was a chick, and I can't call to mind a reg'lar old tramp. So it ain't much good my goin' in for pilin' up luv when there'd be no time for enjyin' on it. It's a nice thing, I dessay, like cyder and pickled walnuts, but it might give a chap the mulligrubs if he war'nt 'customed to it. 'Humin sympathy is the salt of life?' Is it? Then my life ain't got much salt in it, I reckins. Leastways, so far as I knows anythink about humin' sympathy. That's wot a parson chap got torking to me about one day, when he cotched me pullin' turmits in his field. Says he, 'My man, you're going along a wrong road altogither. You cuts yerself horf from humin sympathy.' An' then he handed me over to the perlice, and I got a fortnit in the jug, by way of teaching me what humin' sympathy's like. An' if that's the salt of life, as you says, I'd sooner do without it. Life ain't 'ticklerly jolly with sich as me, and tain't made the pleasanter by lockin' up. There's wot we hates wuss nor anythink, bein' stopt from dodgin' about. Doesn't much matter whether it's a pris'n or a pallis, we'd feel miserable like if we was forced to remain stickin' at one place. A chap had a'most as soon be a eyester as take up with that sort of game. There's no fun in it; none of the larks as come of not knowin' wots goin' to turn up next. My duds isn't very swell, and may be I ain't as clean as a gal just goin' to be married. I see lots of folks get out of my way when I happens to be dodgin' through a town, and it makes me larf, it does, to hear the fine things people says about bein' feller Christins. I went into a church once, to rest a bit—it's a long time since—an' I a'most bust myself when the parson went on with a lot o' that gammon just while the beetle was a tellin' on me I ort to have polished up afore comin' in. But I wouldn't give up dodging along not for all the swell duds and soft soap in the world. Bein' half naked and pretty nigh starvin' isn't exackly jolly when winter's on, and the cold gets into one's bones and stummick. But it's better any day of the week nor sticking down like a cabbidge, and waitin' till yer turn cums for bein' biled. Leastways, so me and my likes thinks, and we doesn't see what all you respeckible coves has to be allays a pitching into us, 'cos we dodges along. 'I'se got no sense of morril responsibility?' Jiggered if I knows what you mean! Morril responsibility! Must be somethink unkimmon grand, it's got such a fine name. Much too grand for the likes o' me though. Morril responsibility! Will it put shoes on their feet, or make a chap's innards feel comforble, when he's got nothink to stuff 'em with but rawr turmit? Will a morril responsibility patch up them breeches so as to stop the cold comin' in? Will it make the ground a bit softer to lie on and shut them bobbies' eyes when I'se picked up somethink? There was a squire, a good sort, I comed across one day, and he begins a torking to me just like you, Mister, about morril responsibility. He guv' me a bob, and said he hoped as how I'd reform. Next time I chanced that way, I axed a'ter the old cock; bobs makes one feel friendly, you knows. An wot does I hear, but that he's bolted with another chap's missus, leavin' his own and three young kids to fish for theyselves. An' if that's morril responsibility, I don't mind going in for a dose, purvided I'm let get rid of the baggidge whenever I chooses. The squire did that a'ter a time, and next time I see'd him, he was just as chock full o' morril responsibility as ever." 'Does I see many interestin' things durin' my wanderin's?' That depends wot you calls interestin'. So far as I remembers, the most interestin' objeck I ever seed was a little bit of chap a whopping his big wife. She could a cracked him in no time, but there she stood just outside the toll 'us—they wos pike keepers, they wos—without raisin' a finger or screeching, and the little varmint goin' at her all the time with a stick as thick as yer wrist. That set me thinkin' a bit, and so, you sees, it must have bin interestin'. Then there was another time when I come'd across a young gal—and she wos a putty creetur, too—a lying dead as nails in a ditch, with her head all smashed in. 'What did I do?' Hooked it, in course, like one o'clock. If I'd bin cotched near the poor creetur, the perlice would a swore I cooked her goose. That's their game, allays. 'Cos a cove likes dodging along stead of sticking in one place, he's set down as a reg'lar bad lot, up to anythink from knockin' over a rabbit to killin' a babby. 'It's just that tramp's doings,' says the bobbies, when anythink unfortunit has tumbled up, and then they hunts him down, while the real chap gets away clear. T'aint fair, is it? There isn't more murders done by tramps than by other folks; not so many, I'll be bound. It ain't our game, you sees, to do big bounce like that. Picking up bits and scraps is one thing, an' breakin' into houses an' cuttin' throats another. We ain't got the pluck for sich goin's on, let alone the work seemin' nasty-like. Shan't forgit in a hurry the way that poor gal's white face came a peepin' out at me when I wos hidin' all of a shiver, in a bit of a spinney, a dozen miles horff where I seed her. By the time mornin' cum'd, I'd jist got in sich a state as I was a'most ready to shake hands with a perliceman. It cum into my hed as how I'd had some hand in polishin' her orf, and it seemed like as if she'd never let me sleep sound till I went afore the beak and said I wos guilty. There wos a rabbut as cum an' stared at me now and again, 'alf afeard like, and I chucked him a crust—I wos mortil hungry, too—to make him stay for company's sake. An' then, jist when he was beginnin' to nibble a bit, out pops a weazle or somethink o' that sort, and he grabs the rabbut, and then I feels a wuss murderer than afore. And even the moon seemed to know it, she looked so watery like and savidge. 'Who was the real murderer?' Never knowed. I was afeared to ax questions, you see; people allays suspecks a tramp if he's a bit curous about anythink. So I jist keeps clear of them parts for a couple o' years, and when I goes back there'd bin another murder, and t'other one wur forgotten. But it wos unkimmon interestin', and guv me no end of a scare, that's sure. 'It wos my dooty to have given information to the perlice?' Dessay it wos; seems to me like as how it's a tramp's dooty to do everythink he don't like doin'. But I weren't sich a fool as that cums to. Dooty! Wot's dooty? Folks is allays shovin' dooty down my throat, but blowed if I knows what it means. There was one cove, he wos a baker, as would never sell me a bit of bread without preachin' about dooty to one's neighbours. An' he got fined arterwards for sellin' short weight, he did. There wos another chap I'se heerd tell on, as got made a member of Parlymunt 'cos folks said he'd allays done his dooty by every one. An' when he died, it cum'd out as he'd cheated every soul, and his bank shut up, and there was no end o' poor people jist ruined. Dooty seems to me a doing of wot will make folks think yer helpin' them when all the time yer just helpin' yerself. Tain't a bad dodge, but too smart for the likes o' me to try, so I aint goin' in for dooty jist yet. An' now, Mister, I'm orf. A bob? Couldn't you make it two? 'You fear it'll only lead me into trubble?' Wot, you thinks I'd get drunk? Likely enuf; two bobs 'd be a temtashin that way. Throw in a tanner, then? You won't? Wot a hard-hearted chap you must be! Lucky it doesn't take much liquor to make a tramp tight. Starvin' stummicks make light heels, you knows! So p'raps I'll manidge to get pretty jolly a'ter all, though it's only a bob you've guv me. Good bye, Mister, and don't go a fancying on yerself sich a mighty fine chap. If you'd bin bred like me, you might have turned out somethink wuss than a tramp. Dogs is bad enuf, but wolves is wuss."

With this kindly admonition as to the dangers of self-conceit, the poor pariah goes slouching away, "dodgin' along" once more in vague search after the one "objeck" of his unsavoury existence. A degraded creature, certainly; a human being without much higher instincts, impulses, or emotions than what are possessed by brute beasts. At the same time, unquestionably a member of a Christian community priding itself with just cause on its progressive civilisation. Is there not, then, something wrong somewhere, some hitch in our social machinery, when such an unpleasant figure can still be seen "dodgin' along" suspicious of all it meets, through this happy and prosperous land?

The Manufacture of False Hair in France is daily on the increase, and within a few years the value of the hair exported has risen to 88,000*l*. England takes the largest share, from 12,000 to 15,000 made-up "chignons" being furnished to us annually, besides enough loose hair to make 10,000 more, while the United States comes next on the list. A great deal of this hair is imported to Marseilles from the East, Spain, and Italy, and especially from Naples and Sicily, the amount generally reaching nearly 40 tons annually, from which 65,000 chignons are made. The chief French harvest is reaped in Brittany and Auvergne, where in some places the girls let down their hair and sell it to the highest bidder, while the rest is supplied by the chiffoniers out of the town dust-heaps. All hair undergoes five processes before being made up. The lumps of hair are first washed, then carefully combed to separate them, next placed in bundles, are afterwards arranged in three lengths for wigs, plaits, and curls, and finally sorted into seven different shades. They are then sold to the hairdressers, who make them up and sell the false tresses at prices varying from 10*s*. to 20*l*.

"WHAT'S THAT?"

FROM THE PICTURE BY H. WOODS

THUMB-NAIL SKETCHES AT A LONDON TERMINUS

II.

As the minute-hand of the clock slides slowly onward, the passengers begin to come up in double-quick time. The best seats are nearly all taken, and the laggards have to put up with such as are left. The refreshment bar is crowded, for it is a singular fact that four out of every six Englishmen who travel by rail think it incumbent on them to take a "refresher" in one form or another before starting on their journey.

Lounging about on the platform, and looking as if nothing in the world had the slightest interest for them, may generally be seen a couple of shabbily-dressed individuals. Nobody takes any notice of them and, so far as can be observed, they take no notice of anybody. Their sole object in life just now seems to be to keep themselves from being run over by the porters with their barrow-loads of luggage. Now and then they will stand for a moment and stare at somebody or something, but there is no speculation in their eyes. To all appearance they are evolving some intricate problem out of the depths of their moral consciousness. If you were to ask me who and what these men are, I should reply that they are detectives in mufti, and that they are employed by the railway company to look after those persons who, owing to an unfortunate lapse of memory, occasionally mistake their neighbour's luggage for their own.

Who comes here? A brisk, vivacious-looking, middle-aged gentleman who, as he walks quickly down the platform, glances sharply to right and left, as if he would fain have people believe that nothing is too minute to escape his attention. He is Mr. X., the general manager of the line. As he strides along an extra spasm of activity seems to agitate every official on the platform, from the busy station-master down to the oily looking individual who attends to the lamps. There is a general sense of relief when the great man is safely shut up in his carriage. He has been known before to day to have a man fined for coming on duty with dirty shoes, and yonder stands a porter who would certainly have been reprimanded had Mr. X. noticed that his jacket was minus three of its buttons. In brief, our general manager prides himself on the fact that nothing is too small to escape his notice, and it is quite possible that he owes much of his success in life to his wonderful power of diving into, and his mastery of, the innumerable petty details connected with railway management. He has sprung from the ranks, having started in life as a clerk at ten shillings a week. His powers of application are immense, and he is never so happy as when hard at work or having a tooth-and-nail struggle with some other company. His secretary has followed him into the carriage with a despatch-box full of papers. Mr. X. will dictate fifty letters while travelling as many miles, which letters his clerk will take down in shorthand, and then hurry back by the next train to write them out. Nearly half of Mr. X.'s life is spent in a railway carriage. He has learnt to eat, drink, and sleep on the road. One day you may hear of him as being in the wilds of Cornwall, the next he will be attending an important meeting at Aberdeen. His detractors—and what eminent man is without them?—say that his passion for doing everything and being everywhere himself, and for trusting too little to his subordinates, is his weakest point. They affirm—these canaille—that matters of moment are often ignored or allowed to "slide" in order that Mr. X. may have time to bully some trembling wretch of a station-master who has done what he ought not to have done, or to indite long wrangling epistles to the chief of some other company respecting a difference of a farthing per ton in the carriage of a ship-load of oranges, or a petty claim for the delay of a hundred hogsheads of sugar. Still, a man of Mr. X.'s experience may reasonably be supposed to know his own business best, and so long as he can contrive to keep his directors well in hand, and his dividends on a par with those of rival lines, so long will he continue to flourish like a green bay tree.

A very different style of man is his friend Mr. Z., the general manager of a big rival company. Mr. Z. is a tall, suave, dignified man, who through his gold-rimmed spectacles seems to look less at you than over your head. Mr. Z. has his clothes made by a West End tailor, is somewhat of a connoisseur in wines, and flatters himself that he knows a good painting from a bad one. When you come to talk with him on general topics, you soon discover that he is a well-read man, but very few people know that nearly all his reading is done in bed, when other men are fast asleep. Mr. Z., unlike Mr. X., troubles himself with few of the details of management. He has had the knack of gathering round him a staff of thoroughly-trained subordinates, each of whom knows his post and what is expected of him. Mr. Z. reserves his strength for great occasions and for foemen worthy of his steel. As a Parliamentary tactician he stands at the head of his class. If any man can pilot a shaky bill safely through the reefs and shoals of Committee, it is Mr. Z. He has the art of making the most complicated array of figures appear lucid, and even interesting, while under the most scathing fire of cross-examination he has never been known to lose his temper or presence of mind. He is always forecasting, always peering into the future. He regards the complicated network of English railways as a chess player regards the board before him. But he plays the game after a fashion of his own. He delights in making sudden moves and unexpected attacks. He is full of feints and surprises. You never know where to have him. He is like a rapier of the finest steel flashing in and out among the clumsy claymores slashing the air around him.

But who cares to study such insignificant personages as general managers when there are so many charming girls fluttering about the platform like love-birds about to take wing? To my mind a pretty girl never looks more attractive than on a bright summer morning when rigged out ready to travel. But who comes here in sable trappings dight? A pretty young widow, as I live. Very demure she looks, but not at all embarrassed, although the eyes of half the men on the platform turn and follow her. Now and again you catch a glimpse of a tiny high-heeled boot, now and again the morning sun glints for a moment on the jet rosary that droops from her neck. My friend the station master catches my eye, and shakes his head solemnly. I comprehend his meaning. About a year ago, as he was sitting one morning in his office, to him there entered a widow as young and as pretty as this one. She was bound for a certain station a few miles beyond Glasgow, and she wanted to travel by the next train. To her horror on going into the booking office to pay for her ticket she found that she had left her purse behind her. She had been staying with her father, the Rev. Mr.—— of —— Square. This morning she had been telegraphed for.—Her child—her only treasure—was dangerously ill, and she must go on at any risk. Under the circumstances, would the station-master pass her forward, and she would remit him the price of her ticket by the first post after reaching home? Now, the only way by which my friend could pass her forward was by issuing an ordinary ticket, which he at once and without hesitation instructed the booking clerk to do. He knew the Rev. Mr. —— quite well by reputation, and he satisfied himself by referring to the Directory that he did really live in —— Square. The widow was profuse in her thanks, and smiled a grateful farewell from her first-class compartment as the train carried her off. "I'm a married man, sir, and I love my wife," said the station-master to me afterwards, "but I am free to confess that for the next three or four days that young hussy's bewitching face did come between me and my work oftener, perhaps, than was quite proper." A fortnight passed, and then inquiry was made. The Rev. Mr. —— knew nothing of any such person, and my friend had to pay for the ticket—a matter of four or five pounds. Well may he shake his head when he sees a young and pretty widow.

Here comes another lady—a portly dame this time, who is about to travel in her own victoria—indeed, it is said that she often does so travel—which, duly strapped down on to a carriage truck, is here in readiness for her. For the privilege of journeying thus, the company will charge her first-class fare, besides charging for the carriage itself. When she has taken her seat in the victoria, we see that she is about to travel with her face towards the engine, and without a protection of any kind from the weather—and not from the weather only, but from the smoke, and the blacks, and the fiery cinders, not to mention that other travellers' nuisance, the dust.

"What on earth will she look like by the time she has travelled a hundred miles?" I cannot help saying aloud. "Just what she looked like when she went down with us in her own carriage about six weeks ago," answers a guard who happens to be passing. "I give you my word, sir, that her face was nearly as black as your hat. She might have been married that morning to a Christy Minstrel."

The guard who has just spoken to me I have known for these eight or nine years. A rather singular circumstance first made us acquainted. I was staying for a few days at a certain north country watering place to which, during the summer months, run many cheap excursions from sundry manufacturing towns, no great distance away. During my stay there, a cheap train brought some three or four hundred working men, chiefly mill hands, with their wives and families. They came in the morning and were to go back at night. The tide being down, some of the men hired a boat and went out for a bathe in deep water. Unfortunately one poor fellow was drowned. His body, however, was found in the course of the day, and brought ashore. Going for a walk in the evening just about the time the excursion train was due to start back, I perceived that there was a greater commotion than usual at the little station. The curiosity of an idle man took me there to ascertain the cause. The cause was a singular one enough. The friends of the drowned man, having dressed him in his clothes, had carried him to the station and smuggled him into a third class carriage, and there he was now sitting like any ordinary passenger, but propped up on either side by a stalwart Yorkshireman. The railway officials, with my friend the guard at the head of them, insisted that the corpse should be left behind till an inquest had been held, while the poor fellow's friends as strenuously insisted that he should be taken home. "He's gotten a return ticket," they shouted, "and the company's bound to take him back." "It's cheating, and nowt else," cried others. "They've tekken the poor fellow's brass and now they refuse to let him ride." It seemed not unlikely at one time that a battle royal would ensue, and not till the aid of the town police had been called in would the excursionists give way, and permit the dead man to be lifted out of the carriage. But nothing could move them from their argument, that because the man had purchased a return ticket, the railway company were bound to carry him back, and no doubt many of them hold to it to this day.

Here comes a face that I seem to know. As it comes nearer I recognise it as the face of Mr. Momus, the well-known low comedian. It is a face, however, that nobody on the platform except myself seems to recognise, so differently does it look on and off the stage. Mr. Momus has two ladies with him. They are probably on their way to fulfil an engagement in some provincial town. They are fortunate enought to secure an unoccupied compartment, and they make haste to take their seats. The train, however, is now filling up so rapidly that it seems doubtful whether they will be able to retain the compartment to themselves. But Mr. Momus, who has a reputation for practical joking, is equal to the occasion. From his companions' shawls and wraps he quickly extemporises a dummy baby and hands the same over to one of the ladies, who at once enters into the fun of the thing. Momus, who can do a bit of ventriloquism when occasion requires, buries his face behind his paper and at once proceeds to give a most life-like imitation of a crying baby, while the lady rocks the child to and fro in her arms, or lays it on her shoulder and pats it gently on the back in a vain attempt to keep it quiet. But evidently it is a child that will not be quiet. "Poor dear, it must be cutting its teeth," says one sympathetic old lady who peers through the window. Many other passengers peer through the window, for seats are becoming more scarce every minute, but none of them venture to intrude. Not for a moment does the child cease its pitiful wailing cry till the train is fairly under way. The last thing I see is "that blessed baby" tossed unfeelingly to the other end of the carriage, and Momus's genial face widening into a broad grin of silent satisfaction.

THE READER

In his "Egypt as It Is" (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), Mr. J. C. M'Coan has supplied a much-wanted volume on a hitherto neglected subject. About Egypt from the tourist's or the antiquary's point of view each year brings with it new books by the score. Of the Egypt of politics and commerce, the State created, as it were, from chaos by Mehemet Ali and his grandson Ismail, there has hardly (a few brochures on the Canal and the Debt excepted) been even an attempt to give any systematic account. Yet the subject in its very nature—in the geographical position of the country, a land apart between the desert and the sea, in the extreme centralisation which gathers up each thread of government into the single hand of the Khedive—seems to lend itself at once to classified and comprehensive survey. Statistics, no doubt, may not be always above suspicion. There may be something ever and again behind the fair show of official documents. On the main questions of industries and trade returns, of public works and general administration, there can be little danger, if only pains enough are taken, of inaccurate or inadequate information. And the pains taken by Mr. M'Coan in the collection and the arrangement of his statistics well deserve our highest praise. From the opening chapters on Egypt and its population—not the Egypt merely of our school lessons, the land that ends at Assouan, but the greater Egypt that shall one day stretch from the Mediterranean to the Equatorial Lakes, from the western oases to the Indian Sea—to the final pages on Gordon Pasha and his work, there is hardly a detail of the material or administrative condition of the State that is not lucidly and amply noticed under its own especial heading. The whole, it is true, is slightly rose-coloured, for Mr. M'Coan does not pretend to disguise his faith in the Khedive and in the country,—in the one as a sincerely progressive ruler, in the other as a region rich enough, even when the Moukabala and the village annuities fall in, to pay five per cent. upon its debts all round. Nor sooth to say does he scruple to run in the face of certain popular beliefs, minimising for instance almost to nothing, at all events to malpractices of middlemen or the late Mouffetish for which the Khedive is scarce to blame, the oppression of the fellaheen so pitifully described by old residents like Lady Duff Gordon, and hardly concealing his belief that without "stick-law" Prince Hussein and Mr. Romaine of the Inland Revenue will fail terribly at getting in their taxes. But his book, despite these and other heresies, is emphatically a valuable one, not the best merely, but the only good general account of the resources and administration of Modern Egypt that we have.

That most delightful of recent memoirs, "Fifty Years of My Life," by George Thomas, Earl of Albemarle (3rd Edit.: Macmillan and Co.), has been reduced, by the omission of the long but interesting family history of the House of Keppel, to the dimensions of a single handy volume. En revanche, the personal recollections have been revived and enriched with some new matter, notably with some half-dozen more naive, hearty letters from the Princess Charlotte, that warmest friend in her and their school days of George Keppel and "the Brats;" letters full of good feeling and bad spelling, now recommending "Frier's barlsom" for a wounded finger, at another time alluding to a "Save" (Sèvres) vase, or plaintively admitting that "je crive tres mal." New, too, unless memory prove treacherous, is the fuller version of the late Dean Garnier's amusing account of a reception at the Tuileries by the First Consul, anno 1802. Lord Albemarle's pleasant book in this its newest form deserves to become a more popular favourite than ever.

"The Spaniards," says old Salmasius, "excel in proverbs; the Italians are little if at all behind; then come the French, but at a certain distance." Be this as it may—though if your proverb should be genuine home-spun, no half-epigrammatic work of art, Salmasius is probably in the right—certain it is that in no other European land do proverbs hold so high a place. In Spain only do they claim their part in literature, whether grave or gay, in serious cronica as in light romancero, in legends told before literature began, in the last products of a literature that, as a purely native growth, seems well-nigh spent and dead. In Spain only are they received at once to clench an argument or sum up a debate, references from which there is no appeal to the wit and wisdom of a hundred generations. And where in Spain, save to Cervantes, should we go for samples of Spanish proverbs at their best? It is some five years now since the author of "Spanish Salt" (B. M. Pickering) gave to the world, under the title of "Proverbs of Sancho Panza," a dainty collection of the choicest of these refranes. That collection has now been altered and enlarged, the introduction rewritten, the notes of parallel proverbs in other languages increased, until in "Spanish Salt," though still confined to the limits of "Don Quixote," we have less a new edition than a new work upon the former lines. Not all, perhaps, of its 352 examples strike us at once as proverbs proper. Some certainly—i.e., 251, 279, and 219—have more, to our unlearned sense, the air of similes or moral sayings. But much the greater number are purest specimens of Spanish salt, excellently arranged (for purposes at least of reference) in alphabetical order of the key-word to each, and prefaced by an introduction which, to its other merits, adds a welcome little list of proverbs, not indeed in "Cervantes," but none the less thoroughly Spanish and piquant. But why, in days of Caxton celebrations, so many misprints in a book that bears the proud device of "Aldi discipulus Anglus?" Erasmus's definition of the proverb or Paræmia becomes a heap of unintelligible italics; and this, though certainly the worst, is not the only error by half-a-dozen that caught our eye in a very hasty survey.

An interesting though somewhat abstruse subject is ably treated by Mr. H. W. Chisholm, Warden of the Standards, in "Weighing and Measuring" (Macmillan and Co.), a new volume of the "Nature Series." But few, perhaps, have thoroughly realised the infinite pains, the reiterated experiments, the complicated calculations needed to secure a standard of length and weight that shall be accurate to the fourth decimal, or proof against the changes of temperature and time. Still fewer have had opportunities to inspect the delicate machinery, the instruments for weighing in air or water, the balances adjusted to the 0·07 milligram by which alone imperial standards can satisfactorily be tested. Whence, again, came our earliest notions of weight and measure at all? From the astronomic discoveries of Egyptian or Chaldæan sages, preserved, as some have thought, for after generations in the mystic proportions of the great Pyramid, or from the simpler standard of the natural proportions of the human body—for the units of length, the finger breadth and the palm; for the unit of weight, the weight of water in a cup so many fingers' deep and broad? What, too, the merits of the metric and the Imperial systems, or the story of our own standard from the old weights and measures of the Norman Exchequer to those restored, after the burning of the Houses of Parliament, by the Commission of '43? To those who seek information on such points, but most of all on the scientific history of our own system of measuring and weighing, we could not name a better little manual.

People who would like to know what English mariners are expected nowadays to have at their fingers' ends should turn—though even here we are referred to other books for the gun, the ram, and the torpedo—to Capt. Bedford's "Sailors' Pocket Book" (3rd Ed.: Griffin and Co., Portsea), a volume quite indispensable we should say, for the higher ranks of working seamen in Queen's or merchant or pleasure services. The chapters alone on "Signal Codes," and on the "Compass with its Directions" would "swamp," in Captain Cuttle's phrase, "a mind of ordinary tonnage easy." But besides these are tables of winds and currents, rule of the road at sea, rules for determining distances and position, for sailing round the edge of the cyclone, for beaching boats in heavy surf, for the conduct of landing parties, &c., and, as if this were not enough, appendices too on the choice of east, west, or middle passage from Australia to China, in-shore routes from Hong-Kong to the Yang-tse-Kiang, and so on. The strongest memory must gladly turn at times to so omniscient a refresher.

One distrusts most Royal Roads to learning, still more when heralded with a preface so pompous and metaphorical as that prefixed to M. Lafont's "Takimetry, or Complete Geometry in Three Lessons," translated by D. O. Gwynne, M.D. (W. Collins and Co., London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow). But there can be little doubt of the value of a system which may enable the unlettered workman in a few lessons to measure with ease and accuracy in M. Lafont's peculiar phrase "the accessible," "the inaccessible" (that which is out of reach), and "the incalculable" that which like the circumference of the circle cannot be calculated with rigorous exactitude, but with an error so slight as to be practically unimportant. The search is the reduction of all objects, so to speak, to a uniform mould by one or other of the three organic rules—we quote once more—of "equivalence," "resemblance," and "the three squares of the right-angled triangle." But the learner will need a box of models, and in the first instance we should say a little oral instruction from the master.

In the Church Quarterly Review for July (Spottiswoode), there are two especially interesting articles. The former, entitled "The Annihilation of the Wicked," examines the various teachings concerning the future state of mankind which have prevailed at various times in the Church. The writer regards the theory of Annihilation, which he holds to be untenable, as a natural reaction from the Calvinistic doctrine, which, abandoning Purgatory, led logically to the conclusion that the vast majority of mankind would be condemned to eternal torment.—The second paper treats of the Church of England in the eighteenth century, and shows how from being full of vitality and activity at the time of the Revolution in 1688 it gradually fell into a condition of sloth and indifferentism. To our thinking this change was in a large measure due to the fact that the clergy, as a body, never heartily accepted the Revolution doctrines till after the middle of the eighteenth century, their attitude towards the two first Georges was one of veiled disloyalty, and so they lost the respect of the laity, who had been taught by the misconduct of the Stuarts to abandon their belief in the divine right of kings.

From Mr. Charles Davenhill, an Englishman long resident in Spain, we have received a pamphlet entitled "Spanish Views of the Eastern Question," in which is embodied the pith of Señor Castelar's eloquent treatise entitled "La Cuestion de Oriente." Señor Castelar, as most of our readers are aware, is no admirer of Russia, whom he would relegate to Asia, leaving Constantinople to "its natural inheritors, the Greeks." Affairs have moved rapidly since the Spanish orator wrote, nor is Russia likely, after all her sacrifices, to relinquish the prize she has so long coveted for the sake of pleasing the Greeks.

We have also to notice Vol. III., F to Kells, of the useful "Globe Encyclopædia" (T. C. Jack, Edinburgh).—"Human Interests" (Tinsley Bros.), by S. Sainsbury, a well-meant collection of harmless maxims and reflections chiefly, it would seem, designed to inspire broader sympathy with our less prosperous or less gifted fellows.—"Essays on Human Culture: a Book for Girl Students" (Dulau and Co.), by Prof. G. D. Wood, of the Royal Academy of Music, papers of solid practical worth more especially as guides to the right study of the more important branches of a common English educational course.—And lastly "A Grammar of the Words in the Greek Testament," by the Rev. C. H. Waller, M.A. (S. Low and Co.), a little manual hardly perhaps to be commended to the general scholar, but very useful for the student who only wants to acquire Greek enough to read his New Testament with tolerable ease, and that within as short a term as possible.

THE PRIVATE SOLDIER

We propose to follow up the subjects already discussed in our former articles, "Territorial Regiments," "The Volunteer Movement," "The Army as a Career," &c., by calling attention to the inducements which the army can offer to steady and respectable men. We have endeavoured to show, as succinctly as possible, the connection which ought to be established between the army of the nation and a national army; the steps by which the Volunteers and Auxiliary Forces, generally so called, can attain this much-to-be-desired end. We have also considered the subject of the army as a career in a short article, and we now propose to summarise the advantages which, so long as he is willing to be disciplined and taught, any young man may obtain in exchange for service to the State in the honourable position which even a private soldier can occupy if he will.

From many causes the tendency to look down upon private soldiers has of late years become much weaker. The long peace which followed the crowning victory of Waterloo caused people in England to think that soldiers were more ornamental than useful, the blood of the new generation was not stirred by stories of battles and sieges, and such small matters as the Burmese wars, the Chinese wars, the Afghan and Sikh campaigns were too remote in those days of slow communication to create more than a passing interest. Men, indeed, thought of their pockets, merchants of their ventures, and of the issues dependent upon the success of our soldiers; but of the soldiers themselves they did not think at all. More than this—we regret to have to say it, but the truth must be told—there were numbers of old soldiers who, under a rough-and-ready discipline, had learned manners of the roughest and readiest, and who, when a grateful country had no further need of their services, were discharged. Their camp manners were hardly suited to the fastidious tastes of people in the "piping times of peace," and the welcome with which they were received on their return to the mother country, the land for which they had risked and done so much, wore itself out. The backs which the drill sergeant had straightened could not bend at once to toil, the limbs which rheumatism had stiffened, and the thews and sinews accustomed to the exercises of war, were alike at a discount when the martial tramp of the soldier had to be exchanged for the plod of the ploughman over weary furrows, and the sword had to give place to the scythe or the pruning-hook. And so it came to pass that many a gallant fellow, driven to extremities, came to an untimely end. Some took to the "road," and perished ignominiously; others to the workhouse, where they droned or pined out an effete existence; not a few, and these perhaps the happiest, succumbed to the combined evils of bad health, wounds, and privation. As it is the way of the world to kick those who are down, and to discard those for whom there is no present use, it cannot be a cause of wonder if the profession of a soldier came to be regarded lightly, and the soldier himself as of no account. Those in authority, whose duty it was to consider him, neglected him, and why should the public trouble themselves about his welfare? But with the Crimean War and the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny a change came over the spirit of the dream. A new light broke in upon the public mind; the Millennium had not yet come, and still appeared remote, and the British soldier once more rose in the market, and became a very valuable article indeed. Correspondents appeared upon the scene, and told us from day to day of the privation, the toils, and the heroism of our army. These useful but troublesome men placed it upon record that soldiering, if it is the sport of kings, is no child's play, and that war can scarcely be waged by rule of thumb. They showed that the greatest qualities of manhood were inherent in every breast, irrespective of rank; that the honour of the nation depended upon the display of those qualities; but that the ignorance, incompetence, carelessness, and dishonesty of those entrusted with the supreme control, and who from their position ought to have known better, went near to nullifying all the great results which might be expected. From this time of trial we date all the improvements in the army, and the amelioration of the condition of the soldier himself. Whatever might have been the difference of opinion as regards the wisdom or necessity of going to war, they were all merged in the determination that the soldier should no longer be needlessly hampered, and that his right place in the community should be assigned to him for the future. "Quis custodiet ipsos custodes?" was the question which naturally arose on all men's lips, and it was tacitly, if not by acclamation, decided that this was a matter into which the nation itself must look, and that it was scarcely safe to commit such vast interests to the care of either clique, committee, or party for the future. Though, owing to elaborate constitutional machinery and national phlegm, we move but slowly forward, the question of Army Reform soon became one of vital interest, and with more or less intensity it has agitated the public mind from that day to this. It has progressed not in arithmetical, but in geometrical ratio, as a very slight retrospect of the annual changes would show, and has now become one of the burning questions of the day. It has been acknowledged that the soldier is no longer an expensive toy, but a valuable citizen, and it is beginning to be whispered that the ranks, instead of being a refuge for the idle and vicious, should be open to none but well-conducted members of the body politic. In one branch of the service at least this is the rule. The recruit is no longer left to his own devices and the tender mercies of "old hands," who will fraternise with him so long as his money lasts, and just long enough to teach him bad manners and spoil his début; but he is carefully watched, and has just so much protection thrown over him as need not be irksome, whilst good advice can always be had for the asking. We hope to treat of this more at length, however, in a future article. It is only fair to the Royal Duke whose pride it is to command our army to state that in the opinion of many thoughtful men no fitter Chief for an army whilst undergoing transformation could have been found. Conservative enough to dislike sudden changes, he has always been open to conviction; and, whilst singularly mindful of individual interests, he has never been obstinately obstructive of public business, and knows how to yield with a good grace to the inevitable march of reform. As we remarked above, we advance but slowly; but we owe almost as much to the caution which marks that advance as to the enterprise and spirit which have conducted it of late years, for we seek no sweeping changes and untried methods so long as we can build up our system upon a firm foundation, and by well-tempered and seasoned courses.

New Music

Messrs. Chappell and Co.——From hence come a dozen songs by popular composers. Precedence must be given to "Lowly Born," the composition, both poetical and musical, of one who has just passed away from amongst us, the Hon. Mrs. Norton—than whom few of her sex have taken a higher position in the literary or musical world. This simple but charming song is published in C and E flat.—Two companion songs, the words by M. X. Hayes, music by Ciro Pinsuti, are "The Captive Skylark" and "The Skylark Free;" the former tells of the yearning for liberty felt by a feathered captive, the latter of its joyful restoration to freedom; both are of moderate compass for a mezzo-soprano, and are calculated to produce a favourable impression wherever they are heard.—"I'll Sing Thee a Song of Araby," from F. Clay's cleverly-written cantata of "Lalla Rookh," has already made its mark as a tenor song; it is now published in F for a baritone.—Although no relation whatever to the above "An Arab Flower," a showy bolero for a soprano, written and composed by Wellington Guernsey and Felice Mariani, is an excellent pendant for it.—For grave and thoughtful hours, "Smiles and Tears," written and composed by Messrs. E. A. Ould and A. Whitely, and "Not Far Away," by Messrs. F. E. Weatherly and B. Tours, are meet and congenial companions; both are for voices of medium compass.—Quaint and pleasing are the words of "My Lover Across the Sea," written by Bessie Hill, and set to a simple melody by Stephen Adams; this song will make a hit at a seaside penny reading. But the great success of the autumn season will be "The Men of Wales," a song with chorus ad lib., the thrilling words of which are by F. E. Weatherly, the tuneful music by Brinley Richards, both of which are sure to raise the enthusiasm of every Welshman to the highest pitch.—There is little or nothing to be said in favour of a so-called patriotic song, "Our Boys," the joint production of H. J. Byron and W. M. Lutz, both of whom could and should have done better with so fruitful a theme for their respective abilities.—It is gratifying to come across so fresh and original a ballad as "The Day My Love went Maying," words and music by Louisa Gray, a simple love story for a mezzo-soprano.—It is but a rare occurrence to meet with a valse chantante which can lay claim to the least originality. "L'Albani," by L. Arditi, who has adapted it from a well-known valse, "Les Belles Viennoises," is no exception to the rule.—A remarkably pretty duet for two soprani is "The Fairy Glen," written and composed by W. H. Thompson and W. C. Levey.

Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.——Under the comprehensive title of "People's Songs and Ballads" come no less than seventeen vocal compositions for which M. L. Lawson has supplied the music; the demand upon his powers has resulted, as may be expected for so long a suite, in unequal success and much monotony. Without cataloguing the whole series, we may mention (Nos. V. and VI.), "A Student's Song" and "A Yorkshire Man's Love Song," the spirited words of which are by Theo Marzials, "The Proud Princess," a poem after the antique by Charles Kingsley (No. XII.), Sir John Suckling's well-known "Love's Resolves" (No. XI.), and, quainter still, his "Love and Debt" (No. XIII.), and "The Passionate Shepherd" (No. XVI.), by C. Marlowe, a poem more generally known under the title of "Come live with me, and be my love."

Messrs. Metzler and Co.——Equal credit is due to Frederick Enoch and Henry Smart for the success of a vocal duet for two soprani, "Fair Flows the River," the happiest of their recent collaborations.—Two respectably written love songs, the one for a bass only, the other in two keys for a baritone or tenor, are "The Knight's Wish," written and composed by W. S. Clarke and B. Tours; the other "She Haunts Me Like a Happy Dream," the joint production of H. B. Farnie and F. Musgrave.—Two pretty trifles for the pianoforte are "Avelette" a "Gondolied," by W. Smallwood, and "L'Etoile du Chant," a waltz, by G. J. Rubini.

Miscellaneous.—— "Andante for the Organ," by F. G. Cole, shows technical knowledge in the present, and gives promise for the future (Messrs. Weekes and Co.). The same composer has proved fairly successful in his musical setting of Waller's exquisite little poem, "The Rose" ("Go, lovely rose") (F. Attwells).—Much may be done with and a genuine success produced by a baritone or contralto who will study "Glorified," a "Grand Recitation and Aria, with ad lib accompaniment for the harmonium," written and composed by A. Phillips and Jules Taubert (A. Phillips).—Our American neighbours never do anything by halves, hence "When You'll be far from Me," is an ultra-love song for a woe-begone tenor; the words and music by G. T. Bulling (Messrs. J. Church and Co., Cincinnati).—A ballad writer of no mean merit, R. Bishop, makes steady progress, as shown in a very pleasing tenor song entitled "The Trysting Hour" (Messrs. Weekes and Co.).—"Spring Flower Waltzes," by F. Adlam, are smoothly written, but decidedly void of originality (Messrs. Hopwood and Crew).—Very interesting to professional and amateur artists is "A Year's Music in St. Paul's Cathedral" from Easter, 1876, to Easter, 1877, a report to the Dean and Chapter, drawn up by W. Sparrow Simpson, D.D., F.S.A., Succentor.

A Sacred Relic of Mahomet is preserved in Cashmere, at a mosque in the village of Harmtbul on the Dhul Lake—a hair of the Prophet's beard. The hair is kept in a tiny gold stoppered bottle, and is exhibited to the faithful six times a year, when great festivals take place in its honour, and Mahometans come in flocks to see the sacred treasure.

Piping Bullfinches are no longer novelties, but a canary trained to sing a definite tune is a decided rarity. A Transatlantic bird fancier, however, has taught a canary to sing "Home, Sweet Home" in a clear, distinct tone. Instead of instructing the bird by means of a bird-organ the owner hung its cage opposite a mirror, and placed underneath it a musical box which continually played the desired tune. The bird, seeing its reflection in the glass, concluded the music came from one of its own species, and speedily imitated and acquired the notes.

The Anti-Chinese Fever still rages hotly in California, and so prejudiced are the authorities of San Francisco that a resolution has actually been passed by the Board of Supervisors forbidding the use of Chinese granite on any public works; indeed one official has already refused to accept a new portion of a roadway because the contractor had laid it with Chinese blocks. Many ships coming from Hong Kong are ballasted with granite blocks, and this granite is considered to be harder and to wear better than the ordinary kind. It is supposed that the officials have passed this resolution in order to curry favour with their supporters, the elections being near at hand.

THE BEAUTIFUL BAY:

A CADENCE OF KENMARE RIVER

I lifted mine eyes, and beheld him lying, that Harper old, on the green sea grass,
And I said in my heart, "I will rise and seek a lonelier spot, O mother dear!
For this thy sea, and these thy woods, and those thy violet hills and dales,
At the coming of others estrange from my soul all their low sweet communings."
So I arose. Now he spake no word, but he glanced a glance, and his spirit met mine;
And swifter than speech and surer far, thus he answered my secret thought—
"Avoid not! I hush not her rich revealings, for I am hers, ay, even as those;
Avoid not, for surely she drew us together, her dearest children, for only this—
To breath to us both some tenderer tidings than ever she whispered each soul apart."
I looked in his face, and I believed the eloquent blue of the old man's eye,
And I knew by the ruddy rose of his cheek and the full white flower of his flowing hair,
A son, indeed, of Nature's love, I looked, and I loved him for her sake,
And returned again to my seat in silence, and side by side on the soft sea grass,
With the bluest blue of Heaven above us, we sate at gaze on the Beautiful Bay,
Gazing, gazing, O delight! for the Sea-turn blew from the ocean beyond,
And ever before his full sweet voice, the Arbutus Islands for utter joy
Shivered in every sparkling leaf, and called "He comes!" to the wooing waves.
And then leaped back with a silver laugh, and cried it to all of their crystal clan,
And the white smile spread, and hither and thither, with dark swift fingers pointed to shore;
The wind-flaws darted o'er the dreaming azure, and the ripples danced after in a diamond dance,
And nearer and nearer the rapture ran till the cool air kissed on the craving cheek,
O, breathing balm! O, sweet sea spice, O, wind of the West that most I love!
Now the sea had risen, and wrestled and lost, and wrestled and won with the struggling shore,
For the golden spoils they win and lose, with the moon above for arbitress,
Till only one thin red torque remained for Ocean's triumphant conquesting,
Then the Sea-turn fluttered, with fainting wings, fluttered, fluttered, failed, and fell;
And the Sun strode down from mountain to mountain, kissing their foreheads with his farewell kiss,
To a happy rose that flushed through Heaven, and thrilled and trembled out of sight.
Then the sweet night fell, and the soft stars shone, and we sang "Good night" to the Beautiful Bay.

Treasury solicitors, made an ex parte statement of the case for the prosecution to the effect that the proceedings were the result of disclosures made by William Kerr, one of the five prisoners who in April last were convicted at the Old Bailey of conspiring to defraud a French lady (the Countess de Goncourt) of 10,000*l.* Mr. Poland accused Meiklejohn of having been the chief actor in the conspiracy, and of having received 500*l.* from one of the convicts. Druscovich, who had been instructed to take charge of the inquiry into the betting frauds, was, he said, introduced by Meiklejohn to the men who were carrying them on, and having got into pecuniary difficulties had accepted a loan of 60*l.* from William Kerr. Palmer had given information which enabled the men at first to escape, and Froggatt had tampered with witnesses, and had tried to procure the release of Benson and his companions when they had been arrested at Rotterdam, by sending a false telegram to that place. A singular circumstance in connection with the case was the allegation that Bale, one of the convicts, was in custody in 1875 on another charge, and absconded from his bail, which had therefore been estreated, and that he continued to live near London up to 1876, the police allowing him to be at large. No evidence was taken, but another adjournment was ordered, Sir James Ingham declining to admit any of the three inspectors to bail, but accepting bail for Mr. Froggatt. On Tuesday there was a rumour that Druscovich had attempted to commit suicide in his cell, but of this we have seen no confirmation.

THE ARTISANS' DWELLINGS COMPANY.——Mr. Swindlehurst and Dr. Baxter Langley, the secretary and chairman of this company, who are accused of conspiring with a person named Saffery to defraud the shareholders, were again before the magistrate on Wednesday. The evidence as to the purchase of one estate was concluded; and Mr. G. Lewis, the prosecuting counsel for the Treasury, opened the case with regard to the purchase of another. He said that Dr. Langley, instead of being the philanthropist he pretended to be, had appropriated 1,800*l.* to his own use; Swindlehurst received 1,000*l.*, Saffery 2,000*l.*; and Mr. Lowe, the absconding director, 1,500*l.* Some amusement was created by the evidence of a Mrs. Roberts, who appears to have been living under the protection of Dr. Langley, and who spoke of various large sums of money having been given to her by him. On one particular day he had presented her with 1,000*l.*, and she had made him a present of 800*l.* At the close of the inquiry Dr. Langley's bail was increased from one surety of 500*l.* to two of 750*l.* each.

DRAWINGS BY THE ITALIAN MASTERS:
REPRODUCED BY THE
AUTOTYPE PROCESS
FROM THE
ORIGINALS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine tact. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. Of the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD-MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

5, Manchester Square.

I have examined Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Check Action as applied to their Pianos, and consider it a most ingenious and valuable invention, which cannot fail to meet with success.

SIR JULES BENEDICT.

45, Blandford Square, N.W.

I have much pleasure in testifying to the great excellence of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianofortes. Their "Perfect Check Repeater" produces a touch that is absolute perfection, and which is unsurpassed by any other maker, native or foreign.

SYDNEY SMITH.

6, St. Mary Abbot's Terrace, Kensington, W.

To Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.

I have much pleasure in testifying to the efficiency of Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Patent Check-Action (for Pianofortes), which I consider a very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted.

BRINLEY RICHARDS.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD-MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

The effect which "the Perfect Check Repeater Action," patented by Messrs. Brinsmead, produces on the touch, is everything that can be desired by an artist. It appears to me the most important invention of modern times, both for freedom of execution and expression.

I have equal pleasure in referring to Messrs. Brinsmead's New Metal-Bark Pianofortes, which, as regards durability, richness, brilliancy, equality and contrast of tone, by far surpass Pianofortes of the ordinary construction at a much higher price.

I will not fail to draw the attention of Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian, of Schleswig-Holstein, to these inventions the next opportunity which may present itself.

CHARLES JOHN HERMAN EUFSLEIN,
Conductor of the Philharmonic Society,
Copetown, Africa.

Bognor, Sussex.

The touch and tone of the Pianofortes manufactured by John Brinsmead and Sons are alike admirable, and having thoroughly examined their instruments, I have much pleasure in highly recommending them. In the present day there is so much imposition practised upon the musical public that the purchase of a Pianoforte that will give permanent satisfaction is a very important matter.

DR. T. LLOYD FOWLE, M.A.

I have great pleasure in certifying to the fine, rich, and powerful tone of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianos, also to the great improvements they have succeeded in attaining.

As a Professor of the Harp, I can safely add that the mellow tones of their Short Iron Gold Medal Grands blend charmingly with the instrument I profess, and form a delicious ensemble.

FREDERICK CHATTERTON,
Harpist to the Queen.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

The Close, Hereford.

Dear Sirs,—Your Patent Action is one of the best I have met with. This combined with the equal tone of your instruments must commend them to those desiring a first-class Pianoforte at a reasonable price.

Yours faithfully,
G. TOWNSHEND SMITH,
Organist of Hereford Cathedral, and Director of the Hereford Festival.

8, Lower Rock Gardens, Brighton.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.

Gentlemen,—It gives me the greatest pleasure to state that I consider the instrument manufactured by you to be most excellent in tone, touch, and quality of material. I particularly admire your Pianos with the Patent Check Repeater Action and new Grand Construction, being a wonderful improvement upon the old system. In my opinion your firm having been successful in creating as good a touch to the Cottage Pianoforte as that usually accorded to the Grand. All those I have chosen have given the greatest satisfaction to the purchasers.

I am, gentlemen, yours very truly,
W. KUHE.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons. Dresden.

I have great pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your instruments. Your newly patented system, "the Perfect Check Repeater Action, when applied to these Pianos, greatly increases their value, and I have no doubt that these valuable improvements will excite general attention and admiration.

I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the perfection of Messrs. J. Brinsmead and Sons' New Pianoforte Action, which, for promptness in repetition, and general excellence in touch, surpasses anything of the kind I have yet seen, whilst the extreme simplicity of the mechanism by which such important results are attained is an additional recommendation.

BOYTON SMITH.

To Messrs. J. Brinsmead and Sons, 18, Wigmore Street, W.

Gentlemen,—I have much pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your upright and horizontal Grand Pianofortes, as they are simply perfect in touch and tone.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accomodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually."—Illustrated London News.

THE SIEGE OPERATIONS AT CHATHAM

Topics of the Week

THE OBSTRUCTIVES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.——The alteration in the rules of the House of Commons has hitherto been without effect. On Monday evening there was one of the most disgraceful scenes the present generation has witnessed in Parliament, and it was followed during the unprecedentedly lengthy sitting of Tuesday and Wednesday by a series of violent interruptions. It is to be hoped that the Irish people are thoroughly ashamed of the few fanatics who affect to represent them in this wild manner. Ireland may be passionate and self-asserting; but it cannot wish that its interests should be watched over by men who seem destitute of all the ordinary instincts of gentlemen. It must be admitted that the House of Commons has not stood very well the severe test to which it has been exposed. Members in their zeal for order have immensely increased the difficulty of maintaining it. If it were left to the Chairman or Speaker, who may be supposed to know best when the forms of the House are being abused, to deal with Mr. Parnell and his friends, their tactics would often be defeated without the least disturbance of the general feeling. Nor is there much reason to be proud about the so-called victory over the Obstructionists. When it comes to a contest of physical endurance between some hundreds of men and a poor half-dozen, of course the latter must give way; but the House of Commons, if it wishes to retain the respect of the country, must devise some much briefer and more decisive method of dealing with these gentlemen whose aim it is to goad us into granting Home Rule out of sheer weariness and despair. While the nation is thoroughly indignant at the agitators who have been making themselves so intensely disagreeable, it cannot but recall with regret the days when the House was dominated by strong minds that made their influence felt without much vehement eloquence. The House of Commons is an excellent institution when properly guided; but left to its own devices it is, as we now daily see, very apt to degenerate into a disorderly mob.

GREAT LONDON LANDLORDS.——Little or no merit belongs to the exalted personages who own extensive areas of those auriferous "diggings" known as metropolitan freeholds. They took the trouble to be born, and that is about the sum of their share in the matter. A few generations ago the lands which they own were of small value, being either pasture fields or marshy wastes, but the patient industry of millions of obscure persons and the perpetual growth of the population have gradually caused these estates to be covered with houses, and have multiplied their worth more than a hundredfold. Men who have thus become rich by the exertions of the public might be expected to show some gratitude towards the public, but they are rarely betrayed into such weaknesses. They are not bad landlords, as landlords go; they faithfully fulfil their covenants; but they are remarkably tenacious of what they deem their rights, and they are not in the habit of indulging in acts of unasked generosity. In provincial cities the philanthropists who present parks and pleasure-grounds to the municipality do not often belong to the hereditary landowning class; they are almost invariably self-made men, whose wealth is due to their own industry and enterprise. It was not a Duke, a Marquis, or an Earl, who beautified Leicester Square and made it a free gift to the public: it was a bold speculator from the purlieus of Capel Court. If we had the magnificent rent-rolls of some of these magnates we are apt to dream that we should be more philanthropic than they. If we were the Duke of Bedford, for example, we should replace the shabby sheds of Covent Garden Market by a structure worthy of a great city, and capable of sheltering the poor outside vendors of fruit and vegetables who now swelter in the sun and shiver in the rain. If we were the Duke of Westminster, whose surplus annual income would make a very decent revenue for a petty kingdom, we should anticipate Artisans' Dwellings Acts and such-like slow-moving contrivances by buying some acres of property every year in the worst part of London and building decent habitations for the people to dwell in. And we hope we should not, like the Duke of Buccleuch, obstruct the progress of the Thames Embankment on the ground that it interfered with the comfort of our mansion in Whitchall; or, like the Duke of Northumberland, extract half a million sterling from the pockets of London ratepayers as the price of our ancestral abode. The last alleged offender in this direction among the coronets is the Marquis of Salisbury, of whom we had hoped better things, because he has himself known what it is to be comparatively poor. The street from Charing Cross to Tottenham Court Road has been urgently wanted for years—far more wanted than Northumberland Avenue, which was pushed on so eagerly because there was a job to be made out of it—and now this improvement is in danger of being postponed for years, because Lord Salisbury, one of the principal landlords on the route, demands terms which the Board of Works declare to be unreasonable, but which his brother peers have conceded to him. The House of Commons is to look into the matter on Monday evening, and we hope, if the Marquis is shown to have secured more than he ought to have, that he will be compelled to disgorge.

THE POLICY OF AUSTRIA.——There has been a good deal of talk this week all over Europe as to the possible action of the Austrian Government. It has given orders for partial mobilisation, and many of those who ardently wish the career of Russia to be stopped hope that this indicates a very decided policy. We may, however, doubt whether Austria has a much clearer purpose than England. The Hungarians, indeed, clamour for war. They would willingly make almost any sacrifice to check the advance of the Russian troops; and it is probably to pacify them that the step has been taken which has formed the subject of so much speculation. But the Imperial Government must consider the sympathies of its Slavonic as well as of its Hungarian subjects; and it is certain that the Slavs would bitterly resent the idea of fighting for Turkey. Moreover, the wishes of Germany have very carefully to be taken into account. For a long time Europe has heard comparatively little of German policy; but Russia has apparently been obtaining very unexpected support at Berlin. Prince Bismarck almost seems to have made up his mind that the present is a brilliant opportunity for winning the good opinion of Russia, and thus preventing a future alliance with France. At any rate, the Russian papers are at present full of praises of Germany; and the presents which have been—or are about to be—sent to the Emperor and Prince Bismarck from Moscow indicate even better than newspaper articles the direction of public feeling. If Germany has really resolved that Russia is to be let alone, Austria will certainly not in the mean time interfere. Of course the Czar may spoil his own cause by going too far; but if he is content to dictate comparatively moderate terms of peace from Adrianople, there is reason to believe that he will emerge from the war with far more solid advantages than England wishes him to possess.

THE AMERICAN RAILWAY STRIKE—TELEGRAMS versus LETTERS.——Owing to the enterprise of our daily newspaper proprietors, home and Continental news is transmitted almost as fully by telegraph as it used to be by letter; in fact, remembering the curt messages of the earlier days of electric telegraphy, we are apt to forget that we are reading a lightning message, and not a letter sent by ordinary post. The wire between Paris and London has now become a daily necessity, and it would seem as old-fashioned for the Paris correspondent of The Times to send his letter by post as to return to the old Calais diligence of forty years ago. America being far more remote than the Continent, cable messages are much more costly; still the accounts of the recent strikes were forwarded with wonderful copiousness, and we doubt not, if events as momentous as those of the Civil War were again to take place in the United States, that the activity of the telegraph would be greatly increased. At the same time one felt that these telegrams about the strike were rather tantalising. They were full enough to destroy all the freshness of the mails which are now beginning to arrive, but they were in many respects disappointingly meagre. They presented facts in the barest and most condensed form, but there is much more that we should have liked to know, and which, of course, we shall learn as the letters come in. Owing in some measure to long-continued slackness of work, the labouring classes must have been for long in a state of unrest and discontent, or the forcible stoppage of railway traffic would not have spread so rapidly over a wide area, or have been accompanied with deeds of such revolutionary violence. Again, we shall be anxious to know whether American sentiment generally approves of the sharp and stern method by which the insurgents were reduced to order in Pittsburg, Chicago, and San Francisco. In this country our authorities are very chary of repressing disturbances by means of shot and steel, whereas in Chicago we read of the mob being dispersed by grape and canister shot. Possibly, the insurgents would not have yielded to gentler remedies, but, on the other hand, these street-massacres must have left revengeful feelings rankling in the hearts of the kinsfolk of those who were killed or wounded, and these memories may hereafter bear bitter fruit.

THE PROSPECTS OF THE FRENCH REPUBLICANS.—The opponents of the Republic in France are playing with unexpected consistency into the hands of M. Gambetta. In the first place the Government seems to lose no opportunity of convincing the nation that it is without real faith in its cause. It prosecutes Republicans on the most frivolous pretexts, and one of its most recent acts was to order the Prefects to keep a sharp look-out on the behaviour of tobacconists, that any breach of political propriety may be at once punished by the withdrawal of the license. A Government which descends to pettiness of this kind can hardly impress the electors with a sense of calm strength. Then the breach between the Legitimists and the Bonapartists is becoming steadily more serious. The latter are quite willing to form a temporary alliance; but the former cannot persuade themselves to do anything that would even indirectly aid the Restoration of the Empire. This week many of the most influential Legitimists went to Vienna for the purpose of receiving orders from the Comte de Chambord, and he certainly has not advised them to encourage the hopes of the upstart family that chooses to call itself a Dynasty. As if the slip between the Monarchists and the Bonapartists were not enough, a bitter quarrel has broken out in the ranks of the Bonapartists themselves: M. Rouher, with that solemn gravity for which he is distinguished, lectures M. Paul de Cassagnac; and M. Paul de Cassagnac heartily returns the compliment, although by no means with solemn gravity. On the whole, then, if we may judge from what is passing among the supporters of the Ministry, the Republican party never seemed to have better prospects, and it daily improves them by acting with remarkable union and sagacity. Marshal MacMahon is freely showing himself to the electors, and uses the very largest words about his mission and his policy. But he is not a strong enough man to fight with success against the deepest forces of the national life.

POSTCARDS FOR THE MILLION.——Postcards, like Mechanics' Institutes, and various other modern devices, have been appropriated by a class higher than that for which they were originally intended. People who write a great many letters, and to whom, therefore, the saving of a halfpenny on each letter is a matter of consequence, use them largely in all cases where neither ceremony nor privacy is requisite. It is worthy of note that, in so many cases calling for correspondence, the aristocratic formality of the letter can be conveniently replaced by the democratic simplicity of the halfpenny card; and also that the contents of fully half the letters which are written may be exposed to the public gaze without detriment. Of course there are limits. Lovers, we imagine, prefer the shelter afforded by the envelope; it would scarcely be etiquette to acknowledge a Duke's invitation to dinner upon a postcard; nor would an amiable editor hurt the feelings of a poet by informing him by the same economical medium that his verses were "below mediocrity." Bad enough to have your lines rejected, worse still to know that the pretty parlour-maid, or pert "boy in buttons," who brings you the communication, is aware of your disappointment. Next to the commercial postcard senders, who scatter them wholesale, as they scatter circulars, we think the chief users of postcards are young ladies. Young ladies are generally short of money, halfpence are more a consideration with them than with their brothers, and, as they are copious correspondents, they manage to cram so much into a postcard that Lord John Manners must sometimes feel that he is giving them too good a bargain for their halfpenny. We imagine that hitherto poor people have not used postcards much. Now that they can buy them singly, for three farthings apiece, will they be tempted to use them more? We are inclined to think that they will not use them much more. Poor people, like children, don't care to have their queer penmanship and phonetic spelling exposed to public gaze more than they can help, and as writing is with them a comparatively rare proceeding they will not grudge another farthing for the sake of the privacy of an envelope.

THE CRUELTIES OF THE RUSSIANS.——The journals which have made themselves the champions of Russia have done their utmost to weaken the force of the evidence laid before Parliament respecting the manner in which the Russian troops are carrying on the war. It is, of course, true that considerable deductions must be made from the excited statements of men who are too near the scene of operations, and too much interested in the issues of the conflict, to be quite impartial. But, allowing for all exaggerations and misunderstandings, it is no longer possible to doubt that many deeds of fearful violence have been committed by the Russians. We do not know whether, as the Daily Telegraph maintains, they have wished to provoke reprisals, but that they have resolved to strike terror into the hearts of the Mussulmans is beyond question. The Turks themselves believe that the aim of Russia is simply to destroy the whole Moslem population of the Northern provinces. This is incredible; but with far slighter proof than that which we now possess it would be fair to charge the invaders with the design of overwhelming their enemies with fear. This is the policy they have pursued in Turkestan and Poland; and it was only natural to expect that they would pursue it in Bulgaria. It is hardly possible that England can do anything to mark her sense of horror at what is going on. She contented herself with expostulations after the outrages of the Bashi-Bazouks; she may not feel herself in a position even to expostulate after Cossack outrages. But surely the cruelties which have been exposed will at least have the effect of putting an end to the foolish talk about the high motives of Russia. A Power whose soldiers uphold humanity and freedom by the slaughter of women and children can scarcely deserve the sympathy of the most vehement enemy of the Turks.

Our Illustrations

THE RUSSIANS IN BIELA

WE have already alluded to the regretable scenes of plundering at Biela, witnessed by our artist, and described by Mr. Forbes in the Daily News, and we now publish a couple of illustrations of the scene, a fact which completely disproves the assertion that an artist or correspondent with the Russians is prohibited from sending home any uncomplimentary sketches or letters. After the occupation of Biela by General Arnoldi, the town was entered and garrisoned by a detachment of infantry, and, owing to some strange negligence in not placing patrols about the streets, the soldiers commenced plundering, and after a while no longer distinguished between the deserted houses of the hated Turks and the dwellings of their beloved Bulgarian brethren, whom they had crossed the Danube to set free. Our artist sketched the pillage of a baker's shop which he witnessed during the day, but he bears witness that the officers made some attempts to check the pillage, and when they caught the plunderers thrashed them soundly with the flats of their swords. In the early morning of the 7th inst., however, our artist (Mr. Villiers) was awakened in the house where he was sleeping by the noise of the smashing of woodwork, and found that the soldiers had broken open a liquor shop, and were pillaging right and left. Presently they challenged the house he was in, but on his telling them that that it was a Turkish and not a Christian dwelling, and moreover occupied by gentlemen accompanying the army, they retired. Shortly afterwards, however, they broke into the cellars in search of wine, and a few moments afterwards came a wild tumult about the door, and a clamouring for admittance. Mr. Villiers opened the door, and found four soldiers maddened with rage and vitriol, for instead of wine the soldiers had found and imbibed some of that fiery liquid which the proprietor of the house used for cleaning wool. The soldiers had at once concluded that the house was a Turkish dwelling, and that the 'devil's drink' had been purposely stored for their destruction. Seizing upon Mr. Forbes' servant, Andreas, whom they took for the proprietor, they tried to force him to drink the liquid, but upon Mr. Villiers interfering, arrested the latter for a spy, and took him to their officer, who, recognising his correspondent's badge, at once set him free. Our artist then, seeing the plundering continue, walked up to the camp on the heights, and asked the colonel commanding to send down a guard, a request at once complied with, and he soon had the satisfaction of seeing the marauders made prisoners and soundly thrashed. The officers were exceedingly annoyed at the bad conduct of the soldiery, and there was some talk of compensation being made to the sufferers.

YENI TABIA—VARNA

THIS sketch represents one of the entrenchments of the important fortress of Varna, the principal seaport on the Bulgarian coast, the head of the railway to Rustchuk, and the place of landing for stores and reinforcements for the European army. The fortress has been put into a thorough state of repair, and has received large consignments of heavy siege guns for its defence. The fort represented was taken by the Russians during the war of 1828. In the distance may be seen the Egyptian fleet, which brought from Alexandria the Egyptian contingent to the Sultan's army.

GIURGEVO FROM RUSTCHUK

GIURGEVO is situated opposite Rustchuk, and, as may be seen by the plan in another column, has taken a great part in the bombardment of that town, though at the same time suffering greatly from the reciprocal bombardment of the Turkish batteries. The town now is almost entirely deserted by its civil population, whose dwellings have been in many cases wholly wrecked and destroyed. Giurgevo before the war was a flourishing little commercial town, and in olden times, before the Treaty of Adrianople, was the fortified bridge head to Rustchuk.

WITH THE TURKS IN ASIA

THE first of our sketches represents the position of the Turkish troops on the heights round Olti, on July 12, at a time when the Russians were as yet unchecked in their advance, and were expected to march rapidly upon Erzeroum. The position, apart from its strategical importance, was one of considerable picturesqueness—the high, snow-covered hills in the distance, with bright green heights in the foreground, a smiling valley beneath, with the winding river and an old ruined Genoese castle, forming an admirable landscape picture. On the lower heights were posted strong batteries of field guns, while earthworks and shelter trenches after a somewhat modern model were thrown up.

The second sketch represents the troops of Ahmed Muktar Pasha throwing up earthworks prior to the battle of Eshek-Khalian on the 21st ult., in which the Turks, attacking the Russians, attempted to carry the latter's position. Although they failed in this, the Russians, who, together with their opponents, lost large numbers of men, thought it prudent to retire, and the Turks subsequently occupying their positions not unnaturally laid claim to an important victory. A few days after this the battle of Zewin took place, in which the Turks gained a bona fide victory, and forced the Russians to begin their retreat, which has ended in the withdrawal of the invading force within Russian territory.

"HOME?"

ALL admirers of the poetry of Thomas Hood are well acquainted with his "Haunted House," a very powerful poem, but, to our thinking, somewhat wearisome from over-elaboration. No sign or symptom of desolation is left for the reader to imagine for himself, all is set down with the merciless exactitude of an auctioneer's catalogue, and consequently the total effect is somewhat exhausting. In his picture, Mr. Waller has, as it were, skilfully skimmed off the cream of the poem, and given us, pictorially, a condensed edition of "The Haunted House," which is very effective. Mr. Waller's forte lies especially in the introduction of animal life, and here we have a group of deer assembled at the very door of the ruinous mansion, nibbling at the leaves of the once-cherished vines. On the right appears the figure of a man,—the owner, perhaps, revisiting his old home. For this incident there is no warrant in the poem, and Hood would probably have held that the introduction of a real live human being would have marred the ghostly effect which he had piled up in such a long succession of stanzas.

A KNIGHT OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

THE seventeenth century is a favourite epoch with Mr. Pettie, and is, pictorially, very effective, because the dress and surroundings are picturesque, and yet the people are sufficiently near our own time and like ourselves for us to feel a real interest in them. Moreover, in the case of this picture, the interest is enhanced by the fact that the gallant knight who regards us so sternly from his casing of steel is in reality a gentleman to whom thousands of us are indebted for many hours of innocent recreation, being no other than Mr. William Black, the popular novelist, author of "The Princess of Thule," &c. That the likeness is a faithful one we can personally vouch, having on the Press-view day of the Exhibition seen the original of the portrait sitting within half-a-dozen yards of his counterfeit.—Our engraving is published by permission of Mr. E. F. White, of 13, King Street, St. James's, the owner of the picture.

THE RIGHT HON. G. W. HUNT

LAST week it was confidently reported that Mr. Hunt, who had been compelled to give up his official duties at Whitsuntide by cruel attacks of gout, would be in his place in the House during the following week, and therefore the news of his death, which occurred on Saturday morning at Homburg, caused considerable surprise as well as deep regret. For Mr. Hunt, although the best-abused man in the Cabinet, was popular both in Parliament and with the public, in fact wherever his portly form was known, and Sir Stafford Northcote elicited cheers from both sides of the House when he spoke of his deceased colleague as a "beloved" member. He occupied a very arduous and unthankful post. The Admiralty—a troublesome department ever since the days of Pepys—has become especially troublesome during the last thirty years, because one invention has been ousted by another, and a ship was liable to be pronounced obsolete before she was off the stocks. When we bear in mind the swarm of critics, both professional and amateur, who buzzed round the First Lord, each firmly convinced that he possessed the panacea for naval mismanagement, when we add to these the ill-natured journalists, who laid the blame of every naval mishap, from the sinking of the Vanguard to the breaking of a piston-rod, on Mr. Hunt's shoulders, we can scarcely wonder that he sank into the grave at the comparatively early age of 52. Mr. Hunt did not belong to one of the so-called "governing families" of the realm; he was the son of a Northamptonshire clergyman. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, and became a barrister, but he presently forsook law for politics, and was chosen in 1857 as one of the members of North Northamptonshire, which he represented without a break for twenty years. He acted as Financial Secretary to the Treasury under Lord Derby in 1866-7, and was Chancellor of the Exchequer during Mr. Disraeli's brief Premiership, which dated from Lord Derby's death till November, 1868. In 1874, when the Conservatives returned to office, Mr. Hunt became First Lord of the Admiralty, a post which he occupied at the time of his death. Mr. Hunt was also well acquainted with matters of county administration, was an excellent Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and took much interest in agriculture. He was no orator, but he spoke in a straightforward fashion which always commanded the attention of the house. In 1857, he married a daughter of Dr. Eden, the Bishop of Moray and Ross, by whom he has left several children. Mr. Hunt was buried on Monday at Homburg, in what is known as "the English graveyard," a very neglected place of sepulchre, overgrown with weeds and long grass. Most of the English and American residents, including several persons of distinction, were present. We regret to learn that Mrs. Ward Hunt is detained by illness at Cologne.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Maull and Co., 187A, Piccadilly.

A BOAT VOYAGE ACROSS THE ATLANTIC

THE New Bedford, which hails from the town of that name, of whaling renown, in the State of Massachusetts, is a double decked boat, ten feet long, and of about one and a half tons register. She carries two masts, one anchor, and a drogue. She is built of cedar, and is leg-of-mutton rigged. She left New Bedford for her voyage across the Atlantic on May 28th, her sole occupants being Captain Crapo and his wife. Bad weather presently compelled them to put into Chatham (U.S.), whence they sailed June 2nd. They met with fogs off the Banks of Newfoundland, and here fortunately they picked up a keg, which served as a new drogue, their own being too light to offer sufficient resistance when lying to in a gale of wind. After this they encountered a succession of gales, were constantly wet, and had very little sleep. On one occasion the Captain steered successively for seventy hours. His little craft reached Newlyn, Mount's Bay, Cornwall, on the night of Saturday, July 21st. Captain Crapo is thirty-five years of age, and of English descent. His wife is a native of Glasgow. The New Bedford is now being exhibited at the Alexandra Palace.—We are indebted to Mr. C. E. Tregoning, of Truro, for the sketch from which our engraving is taken.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE IN THE UNITED STATES

THE history of this formidable movement, which at one time threatened seriously to paralyse the traffic of several of the leading lines in the United States, has been recorded in our News columns, and we here depict three of the chief places of interest connected with the events of the past fortnight. Foremost amongst these is Pittsburg, the Birmingham and Sheffield of the United States, a town swarming with manufactories and iron foundries, and the centre of the iron, coal, and oil commerce of Pennsylvania. Pittsburg is most advantageously situated for a commercial city, being built at the junction of the Ohio and Alleghany rivers. It is an important railway junction, the Pennsylvania line, which has its terminus here, being continued northwards by the Erie and Pittsburg and Cleveland lines, and eastward by the Cincinnati and St. Louis line. Thus it was owing to this that the strike movement assumed such formidable proportions when it reached Pittsburg, although it should be said that the majority of the mob which committed such excesses were not composed of the railway operatives, but of that idle loafing class of low Irish and Germans who form the great rowdy element across the Atlantic. They are to blame for the disgraceful scenes of pillage and robbery, and doubtless for the siege of the troops in the round house, of which we give a diagram, and whence the troops were driven out by means of cars set on fire and driven against the building until the whole was in flames. Pittsburg, which together with its suburb, Alleghany City, now contains a population of 140,000, is built on the site of the old Fort Pitt. The first manufactory started there was a distillery in 1784, and in 1790 the first iron furnace was lighted.

HARRISBURG is another important manufacturing town and railway junction, being situated on the Susquehanna River at the point where the Erie and Pittsburg branches of the Pennsylvania Railway bifurcate, and whence radiate innumerable lines to the anthracite and bituminous coal region, and the iron districts. Owing to the courage and determination of the Governor and authorities, the strikers here did not gain such a footing as in Pittsburg, but although they made strenuous attempts to incite a a riot and seize the railway station, they were repulsed by the patrols and armed citizens. Harrisburg is the capital of Pennsylvania, contains a population of 23,000, and owes its existence to a Yorkshire emigrant, John Harris, who in 1725, with that striking energy and industry which so distinguished the early pioneers, laid the foundation of the town which he determined should ultimately become the capital of the State.

The town of ERIE, one of the most thriving across the Atlantic, and whose name is well known to Englishmen through their investments in her railroad, is another great commercial centre, being the Lake terminus of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and the port to which all the products of the lake-side country is directed. This railway suffered considerably from the action of the strikers, who destroyed the rails in several places, and gave the troops considerable trouble before order could be restored. Erie, whose population numbers about 20,000, was not founded until 1795, when it was laid out by General William Irvine and Andrew Ellicott under authority of the State. To turn to our last illustration, Chiques Rock is situated on the Delaware, on the line between Columbia and Harrisburg, and is celebrated for the lovely view which it commands, as well as for the iron ore which is found in the vicinity.

Our illustrations are taken from the handsome work published by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, illustrative of their line, and are published by permission of the proprietors of Engineering, in which journal an interesting series of illustrated articles on the Pennsylvania line are now appearing.

NOTE.——The remainder of our Illustrations are described on page 110.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.—The vagaries of the Irish Obstructionists have occupied so much attention during the week that but little time has been left for the consideration of other matters. In Dublin the excitement on the subject has been intense, and preparations are being made for public meetings to give expression to Irish opinion in regard to the conduct of Messrs. Parnell, Biggar, and the rest. The Home Rule party is said to be now splitting up, and the Council of the League are even now deliberating on the subject of Mr. Butt's position.—More candidates have come forward to woo the electors of Clare, Mr. F. W. Burton, of Carnelly, and Mr. D. L. Colthurst, of Cork (both Home Rulers). It is whispered too that Mr. Dion Boucicault intends to enter the lists.—At Great Grimsby the nominations took place on Tuesday, and the polling on Wednesday. The candidates were Mr. A. M. Watkin (L.), Major Seddon (C.), and Mr. P. Sale (L.), and the first-named gentleman, who is a son of Sir E. Watkin, M.P., was elected. The late member was a Conservative, so that the election gives a seat to the Liberal Party.—After the declaration of the poll a mob of about 6,000 persons made an attack upon the hotel where Mr. Watkin was staying. They smashed the windows, and behaved in such a riotous manner that it was deemed necessary to telegraph to Sheffield for the military.—Lord Burleigh, eldest son of the Marquis of Exeter, will be the Conservative candidate for North Northamptonshire, vacant by the death of Mr. Ward Hunt, an event which will probably bring about some changes in the Cabinet, though nothing definite is yet known.—Col. Corbett, the senior member for South Shropshire, has announced his resignation of the seat.—A vacancy has been caused amongst the Representative Peers of Ireland by the death of Lord Headley, which happened on Monday last. His lordship, who had reached the age of sixty-seven, was a son of the late Hon. G. M. A. Winn. He succeeded his uncle as Baron Allanson and Winn in 1840, and was chosen a Representative Peer in 1868.—John Frost, the Chartist leader, and colleague of Jones, Williams, and Feargus O'Connor, has just died at the age of ninety-six. He was convicted of high treason in 1839, and condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered; but the sentence was afterwards commuted to transportation for life, and in 1856 he was set at liberty and allowed to return home. He has since lived in quiet retirement, being very simple in his habits and a total abstainer.—On Saturday Mr. Bright entertained some 300 co-operatives of Leeds and Bradford in his garden at Rochdale, and he took care to improve the occasion by dilating upon the the blessings of peace and the terrors of war, especially to the working classes. Five or ten years after a war it was always discovered that the reason had not been sufficient for the sacrifice of life and the waste of money.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Consular service in Turkey, Persia, and Egypt is to be reorganised, and Lord Derby has decided to institute a corps of "Student Dragomans," who are to be selected by open competition and sent to Constantinople, where they will be lodged, and instructed in Oriental languages at the public expense, receiving salaries of 200*l.* a year. Candidates must be unmarried, and between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four years.—The inquiry into the management of the Blue Coat School came to an end on Saturday last, and as the whole of the proceedings were conducted with closed doors the report of the commissioners is looked for with great anxiety.—On Monday the Volunteer Artillery Meeting at Shoeburyness will commence. No fewer than 140 detachments from various parts of the kingdom will take part in the competition at land and sea ranges with muzzle-loading and breech-loading guns.—The Court of Aldermen have decided that Sir John Bennett is not a fit and proper person to take his seat amongst them; but the gallant knight declines to obey their dictum, and has made a second appeal to the electors of the Ward of Cheap. The probability is that he will now be returned by an overwhelming majority, especially as Mr. Waddell, his former opponent, declines to come forward again.—St. Paul's School is to be removed to Hammersmith, where sixteen acres of land have been purchased for it by the Mercers' Company, who are the governors. The school dates from 1512, and was founded by Dean Colet.—The Metropolitan Board of Works have decided upon the institution of a bronze medal to be given to men of the Fire Brigade who distinguish themselves by acts of special bravery at fires.—Early in the year the operative masons of London gave their employers six months' notice that half an hour per day should be taken off their time, and a penny per hour added to their wages or they would strike. The notice expired on Saturday, and, as the masters refuse to comply, a strike and lock-out will probably result, though it is hoped that the dispute will be amicably settled.—Amongst the deaths reported this week is that of Mr. Samuel Warren, Q.C., the author of the novels "Two Thousand a Year" and "Now and Then," and also of an unrhymed poem, "The Lily and the Bee." Mr. Warren also contributed largely to Blackwood's Magazine, and published several legal works. He was M.P. for Midhurst from 1856 to 1859, when he was appointed a Master in Lunacy.

PARLIAMENT

THE struggle between a few Irish members and the House of Commons came to a head on Tuesday night, and, after one of the most memorable contests in Parliamentary history, was settled on Wednesday afternoon. The chosen battle ground was the South Africa Bill, a measure which Mr. O'Donnell, the latest recruit to the Obstructionist party, had marked for his own. There was no particular reason why he should have done this except that the Bill had a good many clauses, and thus afforded a far-stretching battle ground. The obstruction had been manifested at earlier stages of the Bill, and it was no secret that Mr. O'Donnell, having the assistance of Mr. Biggar and one or two other equally well-informed authorities on Colonial policy, was prepared to fight the Bill clause by clause and line by line.

Being brought face to face with this determination the Ministry resolved to take the bull by the horns, and to decide once for all which was the stronger, the Obstructionists or the House of Commons. The little knot of Irishmen depended for their success upon their ability to wear out the physical endurance of hon. members opposite. They had tried it before, and had succeeded, for the sufficient reason that though they were few in number they were determined in spirit and united in action. The Government, backed by the almost unanimous approval of the House, took a leaf out of their book, and beat them on their chosen ground. An urgent "whip" was issued to the Ministerialists, inviting them to be in their places on Tuesday, and hinting at the probability of the sitting proving a long one. Members readily responded to this appeal, and being mustered they were divided into relays, some undertaking to sit till one or two in the morning, others promising to sit till seven, and a third band of early risers pledging themselves to be in their places at seven o'clock in the morning.

This scheme was carried out to the letter, and had the anticipated effect. Mr. Parnell and his friends were taken at some disadvantage, inasmuch as some who would have worked with them had already left town for the recess. To three of these, Mr. Richard Power, Major O'Gorman, and Mr. O'Sullivan, telegrams were sent, urgently requesting their immediate return. In the meantime the little band who had dared the House of Commons to mortal combat prepared themselves for the fray. Mr. Parnell, seconded by Mr. O'Donnell, took up the running, and at the outset fired a steady volley of amendments and motions to report progress at the Treasury Bench. Very little progress was made up to midnight, and the scenes, though lively, were kept within due limits. About ten o'clock evidence of a complete unity of feeling on the matter at issue was supplied by a speech by Mr. Forster, the right hon. gentleman declaring that, though he was in his sixtieth year, and not fond of sitting up all night, he was prepared to do so if it were necessary to pass the Bill. Declarations to the same effect were made by other prominent members on both sides of the House, and shortly after midnight all hope of reconciliation was abandoned, and the question resolved itself into one of who could last the longest.

Sir William Harcourt returned about eleven o'clock, having evidently fortified himself with dinner in view of an exhaustive struggle. The hon. and learned gentleman had, in earlier stages of the controversy, distinguished himself by his direct and uncompromising denunciation of the tactics pursued by the Obstructionists. He now took a fresh opportunity of sprinkling a little salt on gaping wounds, and about two o'clock in the morning had wrought Mr. Parnell into a state of almost hysterical passion, in which the hon. gentleman could do nothing but yell "Sit down! sit down!" a command of which Sir William Harcourt provokingly took no notice.

Mr. Raikes had taken the chair shortly after five on Tuesday afternoon. At four o'clock on Wednesday morning he began, not unreasonably, to consider that he had had enough, and, Mr. Childers volunteering for the post, Mr. Raikes vacated it in his favour. Mr. Childers sat till half-past six, when Mr. W. H. Smith relieved him, being himself relieved two hours later by Sir H. Selwin Ibbetson. Returning at noon on Wednesday, Mr. Raikes found the Committee still sitting, and amid loud cheers resumed the chair.

Through all the intervening hours the talk had been going on, often monotonously as members grew weary, but occasionally blazing out in fierce flames at an angry word spoken from one side or the other. There was an amusing encounter between Captain Nolan and Sir William Edmonstone, better known as "The Admiral." Captain Nolan was accused of being the wire-puller throughout the whole of the disgraceful scene, and was reminded of the fact that whilst he obstructed the business of the nation, and defied the opinion of the House of Commons, he was an officer in full pay in Her Majesty's Service. The Admiral vociferously cheered these remarks, upon which Captain Nolan, with difficulty articulating through the passion that possessed him, accused the Admiral of being a partisan. "But I'm only on half-pay," said the Admiral, and the House, though in no laughing humour, roared at the naïveté of the implied argument. At six o'clock faces began to be missed on either side. Mr. Biggar had by arrangement with his colleagues retired at four o'clock for a spell of rest. At seven o'clock he returned, and greatly cheered the Committee by the information that he had had a good sleep and a good breakfast, and was now prepared to go on as long as they liked. Mr. Parnell took this opportunity of retiring, and the promised relays coming in punctually at seven o'clock, the white neckties began to disappear, being replaced by staid and substantial black ties, warranted to wear until midnight if necessary. Mr. Cross, though he had not been off the premises, had enjoyed a couple of hours' sleep, and now returning insisted on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's taking that rest which he imperatively needed. Mr. Forster also left, and with new faces fresh vigour was imported into the discussion.

At eleven o'clock the Chancellor of the Exchequer came back, and the House began to fill. Mr. O'Donnell was the only one of the Obstructionists who had disdained rest. Whilst, as Mr. Parnell put it, Mr. Biggar had been peacefully slumbering, Mr. O'Donnell had been at his post, and he was there when Mr. Parnell took his watch below. But the long night was evidently beginning to tell upon him, and though he still came up to time and moved his amendments in due order, he eagerly clutched at a declaration from the Ministerial side, made perhaps for the twentieth time, that the Government and the Committee were determined to get the Bill through at a single sitting. "If that is the case," said Mr. O'Donnell, in a tone suggesting it was quite a new idea to him, "we will not be parties to a match of physical endurance." But Mr. Parnell presently returning, and Mr. O'Connor coming up, brisk and breakfasted, the discussion was further dragged out, and it was ten minutes past two before the Bill was finally through Committee, and the Speaker, amid loud and prolonged cheering, again took the chair, the discussion having lasted for twenty-one hours without a moment's cessation.

But even this did not exhaust the appetite for work which the House had developed. The next order on the paper was the East India Loan Bill, upon which Mr. O'Donnell rose and argued for some minutes. Then the Irish Judicature Bill was taken, Mr. Parnell and Mr. Biggar beating their heads against it till twenty minutes past five, Lord Beaconsfield looking down from the Peers' Gallery upon the last division. After this the remaining orders on Tuesday's paper were gone through, and progress was made with a considerable number of Bills, the House adjourning at a quarter past six, having sat for twenty-six hours!

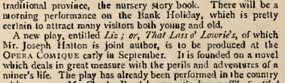
THEATRES

MR. IRVING'S benefit at the LYCEUM Theatre on Monday night brought the season at this popular house to a brilliant termination. The theatre was crowded to the full extent—indeed to something beyond the full extent of its capacity of seating or even providing standing room for visitors, and the performance of Hamlet, revived for this occasion, was followed throughout with a degree of attention no less flattering to the actor than the enthusiastic reception which he obtained. This being his last appearance before his departure on a round of provincial engagements which will extend almost to the close of the year, Mr. Irving addressed the audience in a kind of farewell, taking a glance both at the past and at the future. On his authority we learn that the return to melodrama, in the shape of Mr. Charles Reade's adapted play entitled The Lyons Mail, has been a striking success; though this fact has not precluded an intention of appearing in another play of Shakespeare in the winter season; while among other projects for the future the actor announced his intention of assuming the part of Louis XI. in the play of that name, in which Mr. Charles Kean was so often seen. Mr. Irving made some allusions to the conflicting criticisms to which he has been subjected, taking occasion at the same time to hint that certain objections that have been raised to his "legs," regarded from the point of view of high art, were somewhat beyond the province of the critics. His "legs," however, had, he assured the audience, enjoyed this year a certain immunity from spiteful or abusive observations, while his articulation, of which complaints have been heard in more than one quarter, appears to have given more satisfaction. The observations, which were delivered with perfect good temper, seemed to yield much amusement to his hearers. Finally Mr. Irving announced that there will be an autumn season at the Lyceum during his absence from London, Mrs. Crowe (Miss Bateman) being about to appear in a new drama founded on the story entitled A Dead Secret, by Mr. Wilkie Collins.

English performances have been resumed at the GAIETY, consequent upon the departure of the Paris Vaudeville Company, the last of Mr. Hollingshead's extensive series of engagements of French performers. Without the loss of a single night the regular Gaiety company, including Miss E. Farren, Mr. Terry, Mr. Royce, Miss Emily Muir, Mrs. Leigh, and Mr. Maclean, strengthened by the engagement of Miss Evelyn Rayne—a promising young actress new to the London stage—have returned to their old quarters. On Monday night Mr. Byron's amusing comedy entitled Weak Woman, originally brought out at the Strand Theatre a year or two ago, was revived, with Mr. Edward Terry in his original part of Captain Ginger of the Bungleshire Buffs. The most popular feature in the programme, however, and that to which the flourishing aspect of the house under the adverse conditions of late July must be mainly attributed, is the reproduction of The Bohemian Gyurl, originally produced last year at the Opera Comique, under Mr. Hollingshead's management. This is by far the brightest and most entertaining of Mr. Byron's recent efforts in the field of burlesque extravaganza, not excepting his Don Cæsar de Bazan. A vein of true burlesque runs through the scenes, intermingled with much grace and prettiness of an altogether exceptional character. The dances between Miss Farren and Miss Kate Vaughan in the second scene have rarely been excelled in the way of gracefulness and spirit, and Mr. Royce's impersonation of that celebrated nobleman who is always on the point of inflicting "The heart bowed down" upon his friends and neighbours is as grotesquely droll as ever. On this occasion Miss E. Farren made her first appearance after an illness which at one time had assumed a somewhat grave aspect, receiving a welcome which sufficiently attested the popularity of this sprightly and accomplished actress among Gaiety audiences.

Although pantomimes are at present almost inseparably associated with the Christmas holidays there is no statute forbidding their production at other periods of the year; nor are we aware of any objection to this kind of entertainment in the month of August other than what might apply generally to theatrical performances in the season of country trips and sojourns by the sea side. Under these circumstances we can only hope that nobody will take objection in the abstract to the promised production of a new children's pantomime this evening at the Adelphi, where the last and first pantomime performed entirely by children was originally brought out. On this occasion the "Old Boy"—a nom de plume which conceals from all but the initiated a well-known pantomime writer and contributor to the public journals—is again the author; and it may be assumed that the clever company of little gentlemen and ladies who contributed so much to the amusement of young folks last holiday will again take part both in introduction and harlequinade. The subject is Little Red Riding Hood, for orthodox pantomime refrains from—and even holds in abhorrence—anything like novelty of theme, while it affectionately clings to its traditional province, the nursery story book. There will be a morning performance on the Bank Holiday, which is pretty certain to attract many visitors both young and old.

A new play, entitled Liz; or, That Lass o' Lowrie's, of which Mr. Joseph Hatton is joint author, is to be produced at the OPERA COMIQUE early in September. It is founded on a novel which deals in great measure with the perils and adventures of a miner's life. The play has already been performed in the country with success.—Mr. Charles Reade's romantic drama, The Scuttled Ship, which enjoyed so long a run at the Olympic this year, will be transferred on Monday to the NATIONAL STANDARD Theatre.—At the conclusion of Mr. Jefferson's present engagement at the HAYMARKET Mr. G. F. Rowe's American comedy-drama entitled Brass will be brought out here. Mr. Rowe will be remembered for his clever impersonation of Micawber at the Olympic some years ago.—Mr. Gilbert's Dan'l Druce has given great satisfaction to Edinburgh audiences, who are notoriously somewhat critical.



SPORTING

THE TURF.——Goodwood, as heretofore, has sounded the knell of the departing London season, if, indeed, the Irish "Obstructionists" intend to allow Parliament to rise at all, and bring the season to a close. The grand meeting amid the sylvan beauties of one of the most glorious parks in England can never be otherwise than enjoyable, and each year the general public flock to it in increased numbers. On the earlier days of this week this was most marked, and there were audible grumbles in some quarters that Goodwood is getting too plebeian. For some reason or other—the absence of the Princess of Wales being not an unlikely one—the aristocratic element was not so dominant as usual during the week; and, to speak the truth, the racing was hardly up to the Goodwood standard. In fact the general feeling is that something that may almost be called flatness pervaded the meeting. The sport opened as usual with the Craven Stakes, but out of four starters the talent could not pick the winner, Cartridge beating King Death, the favourite, by two lengths. Athol Lad, a son, as might be guessed, of Blair Athol, took the Ham Stakes, and thus added another to the long list of victories achieved during the present season by the sons and daughters of that famous sire. Athol Lad is own brother to the celebrated Prince Charlie, whose deeds he does not seem at all unlikely to emulate. The Richmond Two Year Old Stakes produced a field of fifteen, Lord Falmouth's filly Jannette being installed favourite at 2 to 1. The choice was justified, as she won easily enough at the finish from Spark and Insulaire. The winner seems as good as she is beautiful, and is doubtless the best filly we have seen out this season. But in a certain aspect the Stewards' Cup was the most attractive race of the day, and it is to be regretted that the recent anniversary of this popular contest has been marked by the scratching of a strong favourite within an hour of the race, for the sole reason that the owner could not come to satisfactory terms with the bookmakers. Of course it is the old, old story of an owner "doing as he likes with his own;" but it need hardly be said that in such matters the strictly legal view is not necessarily the right one. Of the twenty-three runners Caballero was elected to the favouriteship; but he was not served up hot as favourites so often are in this class of race, 6 to 1 being his starting price. It is very probable that he would have won had he not broken down very early in the race; but failing the favourite, the animals most strongly fancied made the best show in the race. Monk started at 7 to 1, and Herald at 8 to 1, and at the finish the latter was first and the former second, while Warrior and Lollypop, who were both among the first six favourites, secured the third and fifth places. No outsider made even a bid for the race. The Goodwood Stakes on the Wednesday showed an improvement on some recent anniversaries, twelve animals of a very fair calibre coming to the post. Prince George retained to the end the favouriteship which he had held for some time, Chypre and Pageant being next in demand. The story of the race may be told in half a dozen words, for the favourite evidently had it in hand from the start, and eventually won as he liked. Not much notice must be taken of the second and third of Gloucester and Rylstone, whose places would probably have been occupied by Pageant and Hampton had their jockeys persevered with them. As it was no one seemed to try at the finish, when it was seen that Prince George could win by any number of lengths. Hampton ran a good horse for some distance under his heavy weight. Sir F. Johnstone, who does not make his mark at meetings as he once did, secured the Findon Stakes for two year olds with Thistle, and Lord Ellesmere's Dalgarno took the Lavant Stakes. In the Goodwood Derby, Glen Arthur, as might have been expected, cantered away from Albert Edward, and secured almost as easy a victory over Monk in the 300 Sovs. Sweepstakes, and consequently found supporters for the Leger. The Gold Cup on Thursday did not produce a large field.

CRICKET.——There has been another good cricket week. At the Oval Gloucestershire has beaten a very strong All England mixed team by six wickets; thus fairly establishing itself far ahead of all other counties.—With Yorkshire, however, on Tuesday last, Gloucestershire had to make a draw, the game standing with Yorkshire having 18 runs to get to win and one wicket to fall. Each person must form his own judgment as to what would have been the probable issue.—At Canterbury Kent has beaten Hampshire in the return match by six wickets. Lord Harris showed a return to his best form in scoring 75 for the Home county.—Rossall School could make but a poor fight against a weak Eleven of the M.C.C.; and Rugby could do but little better.

AQUATICS.——The "International" Regatta on the Thames produced plenty of rowing of one kind and another, but it can by no means be called a successful affair. The Lord Mayor distributed the prizes to the winners at the Mansion House on Monday last. It seems not unlikely that Boyd and Higgins will dispute the Sculling Championship before the end of the year. The whole of the prizes for this regatta were supplied by Messrs. Mappin and Webb, London and Sheffield, including the Presentation Vases of the Prince of Wales and the Lord Mayor.

There are to be grand "sportive" doings at Preston Park, Brighton, on the 4th and 6th inst., under the auspices of the International Gun and Polo Club. Among the attractions will be a polo pony show, tilting at the ring, pigeon shooting, polo matches, and a military assault of arms.

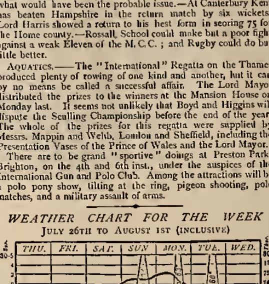
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

JULY 26TH TO AUGUST 1ST (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——During this period we have experienced very sudden changes in the weather. The barometer stood at about 29·76 inches on the morning of Thursday, the 26th ultimo, and from that point it rose unsteadily till it reached 30·32 inches on Monday, the 30th ultimo. A sudden fall then took place till 29·82 inches was reached at 2 a.m. on Wednesday, the 1st instant, after which the mercury began to rise. Temperature has varied very greatly. On Thursday and Friday, the 26th and 27th ult., the maximum readings were 72°; on Saturday, the 28th ult., 66°; but on Sunday, the 29th ult., it rose to 82°, and on Tuesday, the 31st ult., to 86°; while on Wednesday, the 1st instant, it fell very abruptly to 70°, and the wind came round from south-west to north north-west. The barometer was highest (30·32 inches) on Monday, the 30th ult.; lowest (29·76 inches) on Thursday, the 26th ult.; range, 0·56 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (86°) on Tuesday, the 31st ult.; lowest (50°) on Saturday, the 28th ult.; range, 36°. Rainfall: Only 0·19 inch of rain has fallen this week, nearly all of which was on Thursday, the 26th ultimo. Wednesday night last was very cold compared with the preceding nights, the thermometer having fallen as low as 46°, or 40° lower than the highest point reached on Tuesday, the 31st ultimo.

A SINGULAR TRADITION OF THE ORIGIN OF SPECIES is current amongst the tribe of North American Indians known as Nez Percés, and now fighting with the United States Government. Thousands of years ago, says the legend, an enormous animal, the Ills-wau-tsih, lived in the present country of the Nez Percés, and like the dragons of fable devoured every creature which came in its way, swallowing even bears and wolves. The coyote, or "Little Wolf," however, was noted for his cunning, and was implored by the other animals to deliver the country from the monster. Accordingly "Little Wolf" set off, having two ropes of wild hemp round his body, and after some days espied his foe. Tying one end of the rope to two large trees he encountered Ills-wau-tsih, who speedily swallowed "Little Wolf," breaking the ropes. In his inside "Little Wolf" found a number of friends who had been bolted whole, and, cutting a piece of fat from the beast's heart, he rubbed their wounds and healed them, and so injured the monster in a vital part that he speedily died. Freed from their prison, "Little Wolf" and his companions cut up the beast, and the different creatures scattered the bones in various parts of the country, from which sprang up fresh animals. "Little Wolf" dipped his paws in the blood, and shook them over the ground, and from this arose the tribe of the Nez Percés, who made the hero their chief.

CREMATION has been legalised in the Canton of Zurich. This mode of burial is subject to certain restrictions.

THE TEMPERATURE OF THE SEA OFF THE SCOTTISH COAST is much lower than usual this summer. A good fishing season is accordingly expected.

HYDROPHOBIA caused the death of 47 persons during 1875, and the largest number of cases—16—occurred in Lancashire, while there were none at all in Kent.

THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD IN CALIFORNIA is to be commemorated by a monument at Coloma to Marshall, who first noticed particles of the precious metal in a mill-race on the Sacramento River in 1847.

THE IRON CYLINDER SHIP "CLEOPATRA," containing the famous Needle, will be launched at Alexandria on Friday next, weather permitting. The ship was completed last week, leaving only the timber packing to be finished.

M. JULES VERNE is publishing a fresh eccentric story, "Hector Servadac," an account of adventures in the solar world. The island on which his hero lives is affected by a volcanic shock, and becomes a meteoric stone.

THE HIGHEST RAILWAY IN THE UNITED STATES has just been completed over the summit of the Laveta Pass in the Sangre de Christo Mountains, Nevada, which has an altitude of 9,340 feet, more than 3,000 feet higher than the Rigi Railway.

SINGLE POST-CARDS can now be purchased, instead of in packets of a dozen, as hitherto. One post-card costs ¾*d.*, two, 1½d., three, 2*d.*, and six, 4*d.*; while thinner ones can be bought at the rate of ¾*d.* each, three for 1¾*d.*, five for 3*d.*, or six for 3½*d.*

THE QUESTION OF SEATS FOR SHOP ASSISTANTS, which was so warmly discussed in England some time since, has been raised by the New York Board of Health, and an inquiry has been instituted upon the subject. We wish a similar step could be taken in England.

A CANNON BALL is worshipped as a god by the inhabitants of Banavar, in Mysore. Until two years ago the people worshipped the cannon itself, but the Government taking possession of the weapon the ball was abstracted, and placed in a shrine, where it now receives divine honours.

THE ARTISTIC CONGRESS, which meets at Antwerp this month during the Rubens Tercentenary, will study the copyright question. The members intend to draw up an international code to protect pictures from being copied illegally, and to secure to composers a reasonable share of the profits from their works.

TOURISTS IN SWITZERLAND are scarce this autumn. The Russians and the French are occupied with home affairs, the English, usually so plentiful, have deserted their old hunting-grounds for less well-known countries, and the only visitors in any number are the Germans, who are not by any means noted for their lavish expenditure.

TOBACCO CULTIVATION IN GERMANY occupies about 54,000 acres, according to a recent Consular report, two-thirds of which are in the Southern States and the remainder in Brandenburg and Pomerania. The average crop is worth about 9,000,000*l.*, and the German Empire, in spite of its enormous consumption of tobacco, exports far more than it receives.

THE AMERICAN ARCTIC EXPEDITION, which will endeavour to reach the Pole by means of a system of forming stations at regular intervals, and thus gradually getting nearer the desired goal, will start from New York on the 1st July, 1878, under the command of Captains Howgate and Tyson. A pioneer vessel, the Florence, was to leave New London this month to establish the first basis of supplies.

KING VICTOR EMMANUEL is taking his holiday in the Alps, where, at his favourite hunting-box, Valsavaranche, he tends the most simple life, and gives himself up to the pleasures of the chase. He is always the first riser in the morning, and wakes up his officers and suite. Clad in a velvet shooting costume, with a large Tyrolean hat, the King spends his days hunting the chamois and the "bouquetin," the latter, which are fast becoming extinct, being carefully preserved for His Majesty. He is a splendid shot, and an indefatigable climber and walker, never seeming to feel fatigue. His fare is of the simplest—almost too frugal for many of his companions—and consists mainly of plain roast meat, a haricot of mutton, and claret.

LONDON MORTALITY again declined last week, and 1,430 deaths were registered, against 1,438 during the previous seven days, being 314 below the average, and at the rate of 21·1 per 1,000. There were 27 deaths from small-pox (a decrease of 8), 51 from measles (an increase of 9), 25 from scarlet fever (an increase of 6), 4 from diphtheria, 23 from whooping-cough (a decline of 13), 24 from different forms of fever, and 184 from diarrhœa. Different forms of violence caused 41 deaths, 39 were the result of negligence or accident, including 13 from drowning. There were 2,429 births registered, against 2,415 during the previous week, being 98 above the average. The duration of sunshine last week was only 21·7 hours out of the 109·9 hours that the sun was above the horizon. The mean temperature was 60·8 deg., or 1·5 deg. below the average.

THE OLD HOTEL DIEU AT PARIS is to be pulled down, a new building having been erected in its stead. The hospital is supposed to have been founded by St. Landry, Bishop of Paris, about the seventh century, and was originally styled the "Grand Hospice de l'Humanité." The Canons of Notre Dame supported the charity, and crowds of sick people assembled daily before the Cathedral to solicit admission. After each case had been inquired into, the deserving patients—each with a parchment band round his arm, indicating his name, address, and malady—were placed under the care of nuns, who involuntarily did much damage to their charges by plying them with tempting delicacies, such as fruit, cakes, and other sweet things. The friends and relations were admitted at all hours to see the patients, and sometimes brought food. The regimen of the hospital was of the plainest, mutton and beef being the daily food, and occasionally fish or eggs in very dangerous cases. The hospital continued in this desultory condition till the reign of Napoleon I., who placed the institution under proper control, and restricted the inmates to sick persons, removing the lunatics, children, and old people who had taken refuge there. The building itself was also altered, the original entrance through the old chapel built in 1380 being replaced by the present gateway, and the Pont au Double, which had a large room over the footway, being supplanted by the Pont au Change.

THE ROYAL AND ANCIENT GAME OF GOLF

FASHIONS

THE London season is at an end, and as regards the toilette there is little else thought of or discussed save unceremonious attire for foreign travel, the seaside, and woodland rambles, or ceremonious costumes for visits to our friends at their country-seats, with the attendant out-door fêtes, tennis matches, &c.

Lawn-tennis is certainly the most popular pastime of the period; it is well for our young readers, before setting out for a visiting tour, to provide themselves with one or more costumes appropriate for this health-inspiring and active game. The chief points to be considered for a tennis-suit are: a certain amount of warmth combined with lightness, and a perfect freedom of movement. As for cricketers, male, so for tennis-players, female, flannel or thin serge are most desirable; all manner of long skirts, fastened up, should be rigorously put aside; some of our contemporaries advise an elastic to fasten back the skirt, but if it be well gored there is no need of any strap or string whatever. For example, a Princess dress, made all in one, and trimmed to simulate a petticoat—clear from the ground about two inches; materials, fine Saxony flannel, pale blue, with a false jupon, or hem of white corded silk, embroidered in silver thread, or with a wide silver braid, on either side of which is a Grecian border in narrow braid. For a slender figure a finely pleated blouse-bodice, fastened round the waist by a silver band, may be worn in lieu of the ordinary tight-fitting bodice; white silk or light chip hat, with a long ostrich feather round the crown, moderately wide brim, turned up on one side, with a velvet bow or flower of the colour worn by the fellow players; the badge of the club or society should be worn to fasten the collar and fix the feather. This costume may be made in white flannel, with a black velvet band on the hem, about six inches wide, richly embroidered in coloured silk, roses of every shade, with foliage, autumn flowers, or variegated ivy. There are numerous clubs for this pastime, each of which has a uniform, a desirable arrangement, for, to the looker-on, as well as the player, the intricacies of the game are rendered much clearer thereby. Attention should be paid to the shoes and stockings, the former are more becoming in black than in light colours, the latter must match with the colour of the dress; stripes for stockings should be lengthways, as when round they make the ankles look thick. There is a good opportunity for the display of taste in the natty aprons worn for this game; sometimes they are made with three pockets, at others with one, with or without bibs, according to fancy. For morning or undress costumes brightly striped woollen petticoats, with laveuse tunics of navy blue serge or bége, are very suitable. With this style of dress nothing looks better nor is more comfortable than a well-fitting grey or stone-coloured felt hat with a striped band or a coloured wing to match the petticoat; a light straw hat, trimmed with muslin and natural or artificial flowers, is much worn, but all fluttering ribbons or veils should be carefully avoided.

As to the costumes to be seen at fêtes and garden parties, they baffle description, so eccentric and fantastical are they in design and colour. It is the fashion to adopt what is called "an artistic style," sometimes the result is really picturesque, but more often a ludicrous jumble of three or four past centuries. Two costumes lately described by a contemporary will be sufficient to illustrate the gaudy and eccentric taste displayed at a recent afternoon party: "A dress of bright red cambric, with a narrow flounce on the skirt, a band round the waist, and a large fichu of white Mull muslin, edged with a gathered frill of the same tied with a bow in front, a straw hat tied down under the chin with red strings which came from the crown." Another costume is thus described: "Cream-coloured mousseline de laine, the skirt very long and tight and perfectly plain, and the waist, which was almost under the arms, was encircled with a broad band. Large fichu of the same material edged with gathered lace, crossed in front and tied at the back; sleeves made with a large puff on the shoulders, and very tight below, with deep cuffs of lace turned back from the hand. A very large hat of green velvet, trimmed with feathers of the same shade."

Either one of these singular costumes may be modified or made graceful and becoming; for example, soften the fiery red thus: for the front breadth trim in what is technically called "infantile robings," of either Torchon or Valenciennes lace, insertion and edging, the fluted flounce on the hem edged top and bottom to match, revers to correspond; the train skirt put in at the waist in thick pleats, high plain corsage trimmed with braces, edged with lace, and crossed back and front, Leghorn hat lined with white or cream-coloured silk, trimmed with feathers of the same hue, and red roses with foliage, or Lady Pollock geraniums, lace fichu with red bows. The stiff lines of the second costume may be broken by a wide black lace scarf, of rich design, or one of black net, handsomely embroidered in colours, arranged on the skirt, and loosely knotted below the left hip, a fichu to match tied at the back.

Those of our readers who are going out for a genuine holiday to the seaside cannot do better than make a tour of the numerous well-established firms who at this season sell off their genuine summer stock at reduced prices, and, having called together their friends for amateur working parties (each member to provide her own sewing-machine), to make up their veritable bargains in a simple but stylish manner. Washing batiste, cambrics, linens, &c., made in a mixture of plain and striped materials, Princess shape, or with a petticoat and draped tablier, trimmed simply with English embroidery and rich ribbon bows; white, buff, stone, or grey are the least likely to fade or wash out. For the seaside plain black is not desirable, as it quickly becomes rusty, grisaille, black and white checks, or broad stripes, are in great favour; they look cool and are very serviceable. Foulard and alpaca are very useful for country wear, as they are light, and yet sufficiently thick to keep off the fierce rays of the sun. A dark blue linen looks pretty made with a laveuse tunic, trimmed with Holbein lace, a small fichu tied behind, white straw or muslin hat, trimmed with field flowers. For rough windy weather, a blue serge costume is indispensable. The trimmings mostly worn this season are wide black or white braid, or numerous narrow rows of the same; morning dresses are made very plain; a short pilot jacket with a wide square collar and large bone buttons forms a useful part of the toilette; narrow brimmed, close-fitting felt hats are usually adopted for stormy weather or general yachting purposes, as even a capful of wind is very awkward with the more stylish Peg Woffington or Gainsborough hat.

Now that the promenade dresses are worn short, or, at all events, well looped up, the greatest attention is paid to the boots, shoes, and stockings. For long walks and rambles over the rocks high soft leather boots, with buttons and low square heels, are the most comfortable, as the sea water soon rots the elastic sides; the stockings, of silk or Lisle thread, should either be of black embroidered in colours to match the dress, or of the same hue as the costume worked in white. For the evening walk on the pier shoes of the daintiest description are worn with pearl, silver, or gold buckles; steel is easily rusted, and should be avoided. The mania for wearing mittens out of doors is on the increase, in spite of our advice to the contrary. In the country or on the seashore the sun freckles, tans, and even blisters delicate skins. Gants de Suède, with three or more buttons, afford a much greater protection to the hands.

No promenade costume is considered complete without some covering for the shoulders, however small and light it may be, hence fichus in great variety are to be seen, and afford scope for the display of taste and ingenuity. Sometimes these fichus are made of the same material as the dress, at others of white grenadine trimmed with Holbein lace, or Mull muslin with Valenciennes lace.

New Novels

"PHYLLIS" (3 vols.: Smith and Elder).—We imagine that we may assume this novel to be a first effort in fiction, and as such it is one of considerable promise, though the author—manifestly a lady—has still, like most novices, very much to learn. "Phyllis" is one of those tales becoming so common nowadays, stories of the trials and troubles of married life, rather than of courtship, as here we have the lovers married at the end of the first volume instead of the third. "Lovers," indeed, is hardly the right designation of the hero and heroine in this case, for though Marmaduke Carrington falls passionately in love with Phyllis Vernon at first sight, she only gives him in return the faint liking of a girl's heart not yet awakened to the meaning of love—liking him best, as she frankly tells him, next to "mother, and Roland, and Billy," and preferring him to "Dora and Papa." It would have been much better, we think, if the author had been satisfied that the interest of her story should depend on the difficulties which might be developed easily and naturally from such a situation without dragging in a sensational episode in the shape of a sudden appearance on the scene of a former wife of 'Duke Carrington's, whom he had the strongest reasons for believing dead before he set about his wooing of Phyllis, and concerning whose existence he has been unwisely reticent. As this unpleasant and disreputable female is good enough to die of malignant fever within a few months of her fluttering the dove-cotes of Strangemore, and as the whole episode seems to us fruitless of results that might not have been brought about just as well without it, the story would have gained by its omission. The treatment of such an episode demands some tragic power in a novelist, and tragic power can hardly be looked for in a writer whom we should take to be hardly more than a girl. Another fault we have to find with the book is that Phyllis, who tells her own tale, tells it always in the present tense, a method of narration which involves her in continual awkwardnesses of expression, and sometimes in what reads like an offensive egotism. Thus, "I am seventeen—not sweet seventeen—there is nothing sweet about me. . . . I am entirely without any of the little graceful, kittenish blemishments of manner that go far to make Dora the charming creature she is. . . . My feet are small and well-shaped, and so are my hands," with much more of the same sort. As the author has done well enough already to make us anxious that she should do better in future, we hope in her next story she will abandon this trick, fashionable as just now it seems. The group of guests whom Marmaduke and his wife draw round them at Strangemore are very brightly and naturally sketched—all, that is, but a certain Sir Mark Gore, a specimen of the "bold, bad man," with whom the author, perhaps to her credit, does not seem at all at home. But she has, at any rate, written a story which interests and amuses, and, unless we are greatly mistaken, will some day write a much better one.

"Masston: A Story of These Modern Days," by A. J. Duffield and W. H. Pollock (2 vols.: Smith and Elder).—The authors of this "story"—it is they, not we, who so call it—are able and thoughtful men—at least one of them is so—who appear fervent converts to the social and economical views eloquently propounded by Mr. Ruskin. "Masston," we apprehend, stands for Birmingham; and we are again and again made to contrast the good old days of the workmen who, calling no man master, "handled iron and steel with as keen an interest as that of the sculptor who mixes his clay and scans the marble wherein his thought lies hid," with the evil change when these independent workmen became transformed into journeymen, and "no longer made whole things, but one workman made one part, another another part, and so each became dependent upon each other, and all upon Mr. Warner," the proprietor of the great 'Oxford Works.' We have already intimated that clever and striking as scenes in the book unquestionably are, we can hardly consider it a "story" at all. Incidents seem to follow one another almost at haphazard, and there is so little effort at connexion and coherence that we could almost fancy that neither of the composers had been careful to master the portion of the work contributed by the other. For instance, the five or six and twenty years, which is the least period that would be required for Hugh Arden to grow up, be called to the Bar, and gain some reputation as a junior of promise, must have worked their effect on the mirth-loving Julia Ascham, who seems of marriageable age before he comes into the world, yet at the close of the story we find her exhibiting all the wilfulness and coquetry of the girlish beauty to whom we are introduced at its commencement. The circumstances also of Robert Warner's sudden rise to wealth and social position should surely have been explained with a little more clearness. In short, as a novel the book is a failure; but thoughts and suggestions are to be met with in its pages which will make many readers feel that the time they have spent over it has not been thrown away.

"Avondale of Avondale; a Political Romance," by Uttere Barre (3 vols.: Remington and Co.).—Walter Avondale is a sort of Vivian Grey—whom, so far as the variety of the gifts and accomplishments bestowed upon him goes, he much resembles—who sets himself to construct a new political party out of those moderate Liberals who, disliking and distrusting the democratic tendencies shown by Arthur Stuart Maitland (Mr. Gladstone), are willing to act under the leadership of the Marquis of Wharfedale, a nobleman whose counterpart in the actual political world we fail to recognise. It is unfortunate for the book that it necessarily challenges a comparison—which cannot be for its advantage—with Lord Beaconsfield's novels; but even without the memory of "Vivian Grey," and "Coningsby," and "Sybil," in our mind, we do not think we should have cared much for "Uttere Barre's" production. We do not say that the book is without merit—indeed some of the author's sketches of the leading public men of the day are rather acute and pungent bits of criticism—but as a whole it fails in stirring up our interest either in the public or private life of the hero and his companions, and leaves us with the impression that "Uttere Barre" has attempted a task for the present, at least, beyond his powers.

"The Moonraker: A Story of Australian Life," by Richard Dumbledore (Remington and Co.).—"Moonrakers" appears to be a name bestowed on night poachers in certain parts of the West of England, and as we do not gather that any of the dramatis personæ of the work before us were night poachers, the suitability of the title may be thought open to question. Though the story, which is occupied only with the adventures of a couple of country lads, is said to be one of Australian life, it is nearly half over before we find ourselves fairly at the Antipodes. Once there, however, it decidedly improves, and as a tale of outdoor life becomes very fairly readable, but perhaps those are likely to think the most of it who take the precaution of commencing at chapter xii.

RURAL NOTES

THE COLORADO BEETLE.——If the Colorado beetle can be discovered at all in this country there is little doubt that its term of possession must be shortlived. Coloured prints of its points, and prints untinted, have been distributed throughout the land by the agricultural papers, and if these illustrations of the destructive insect differ somewhat in size and colour, they are altered not so much in shape, it is to be hoped, as not to be recognisable by policemen on the watch at ports whence foreign commodities come, and by potato growers, who with sharp eyes do not trust their "praties" to the prescience of these outside "parties." It was reported that the Colorado beetle had really appeared among the potatoes in Herefordshire, but a naturalist sent down by the Privy Council disabused the terror-stricken minds of the growers on Sunday afternoon (the better the day the better the deed). The creature that had created almost as much alarm as the sea serpent at Oban was but a seven-spotted lady-bird, inimical only to the larvæ which do injure vegetation. The Colorado beetle, there can be no doubt, wrought much havoc in America, from whence we have within recent years derived some of our best-flavoured and most prolific seed potatoes. But we have been crying "Wolf, wolf!" so often that there is danger now that when it really comes, if it ever do, and it is to be hoped not, potato growers will be in the same position as the little boy with his sheep. Perfect models of the original beetle, the real Simon Pure, from its egg state upwards, are advertised to be had at the Farmer office.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.——The recommendations of the Select Committee on the Cattle Plague are more stringent than many people—and indeed some of its own members—approve. They are considered as a violation of Free Trade, and there is some colour for the accusation of their infringement of this principle. All foreign cattle, it has been resolved, are to be slaughtered at the port of debarkation; no importations at all are to be permitted from Belgium, nor from Germany save from Schleswig-Holstein, on whose rich plains disease among cattle has never been. Two excellent recommendations are that the owners of cattle in England be compensated out of the Imperial Exchequer for all cattle slaughtered on account of the plague; and that all future laws for the regulation of the cattle trade should be made the subject of distinct legislation. The former will render it unnecessary for graziers to conceal the presence of disease in their herds, which they have too often in bygone days done, to the great detriment of their neighbours, and the latter will prevent the muddle which is unavoidable through the multifarious Privy Council Orders. In the case of compensation, however, it may be remarked that there will be a difficulty in valuing the worth of cattle in choice breeding herds, as it can scarcely be expected that arbiters would award from 500 gs. to 3,000 gs. for a single animal, prices at which some recently have been sold. The killing of all foreign cattle at Deptford will have a serious effect, for a time at least, upon the Metropolitan Live Stock Market. Indeed it is not unlikely that producers of beef will send to local markets instead, where Privy Council Orders apply not, and butchers are not afraid to penetrate within the gates—where exits are free as entrances, which now they are not in Copenhagen Fields.

THE WEATHER.——St. Swithin has not been quite so bad as his promise. He has not been continuously using his watering pan. He has permitted sunshine of a very glowing character to interpose between about the heaviest drops of rain we remember to have seen fall. So heavy, indeed, have they been that they have done much damage to crops of wheat in the southern counties of Scotland, and also in various districts of England. The weather has been very irritating to farmers who were late with their hay. There have been so many broken days that the saving has been costly, and the hay neither so good in colour or flavour as could have been desired. The wheat beaten down, however, being late, has yet time to erect its head again under the influence of breezy sunny weather ere its ear is full and mellowed for the reaper. The grass looks wonderfully well, and turnips are flourishing, so likewise potatoes, and there is but little appearance of "disease," which has proved a much more insidious and deadly foe than the Colorado beetle can possibly be. We cannot photograph or model this maleficent agent to the tuber, at all events to the entire satisfaction of micographists. By the way, would it not be consistent with the proposed Cattle Plague legislation to stop the importation of foreign potatoes, especially American, Belgian, and German, instead of permitting them to enter with larvæ in their stomachs, and beetles on their backs?

THE SHOW SEASON.——The show season is in full swing now, and will be for some weeks to come. The results of a year's careful training, feeding, and selection of cattle and sheep are being presented to the agricultural and general public on many fields. It cannot be said that in the principal classes of animals there has been seen one superior or even equal to some that have been exhibited in previous years, but the average quality has been greater, showing the educational value of such institutions. The financial successes of the exhibitions that have been held are greater than usual, the two principal ones—the Royal of England, and the Highland of Scotland—having pocketed coin far beyond amounts they ever dreamed of. The one was held at Liverpool, the other in Edinburgh. It was not much to be wondered at that Liverpool should exceed Birmingham in sightseers, but decidedly it is that Edinburgh should so far outpace Glasgow in its drawings at the gates, 6,717*l.* to 6,231*l.* What will the "Glaiska folk say noo to the Embro' people?"

MISCELLANEOUS.—Misfortunes never come singly to the British farmer. It is only recently that the Colorado beetle noticed above found its way into Cologne, and now we have reported in the Farmer a mole cricket voraciously eating up rye in Minden. We hope it will mind its own business there, and leave our crops alone.—The crops in France are reported to be of a character not likely to affect the British markets.—Rain is wanted in Calcutta for crops.—American meat in large quantities is arriving in Liverpool, and it is expected that in the course of next week there will be something like a thousand head of live stock. Much American dead meat has had to be condemned.

THE PRIVATE SOLDIER

II.

WE showed in our last article upon this subject the real starting point of effective Army Reform. Having once admitted its necessity, it may be supposed that it was not long before the nation began to insist upon a commencement in the right direction being made. The evils existent in our army, as it was then constituted, were patent, and it seemed to many people the easiest thing in the world to eradicate them. But the powers that were would not take the initiative, and so the process had to be entrusted to amateurs, with the usual results that attend the first efforts of amateurs, namely, a great deal of misdirected energy and a great many mistakes. It must not be supposed that we allude to individuals; the contest was simply between public opinion and military conservatism, the former of which had to enforce specific performance upon the latter. The discharge of this duty devolved upon public men who were not, of necessity, professional soldiers, but in many instances civilians, and who were not tainted with military officialism if they were ignorant of military matters. At all events they served the purpose; for though discussion may be a tedious method of abolishing a faulty system it is a pretty safe one. It focusses the "happy thoughts"—the rays of intelligence—from many minds, and by bringing this concentrated light of intellect and opinion to bear upon any question, it compelled those who know most about that question to attend to it. Discussion and inquiry march hand in hand, and fill the properly educated official mind with dismay, but their influence is most salutary. The first results of virtuous indignation were soon apparent in the spasmodic attempts made to close the mouth of the private soldier by what were, considering the quarter from whence they came, undoubtedly great concessions. It was, however, "much cry and little wool" after all, and unfortunately just at this time, some "malaprop," some well-meaning but inept individual, got hold of the compound barbarism, "red-tapeism." In skilful hands it would have been a most dangerous weapon, but unscientifically brandished it was rather an ally to the enemy, and cut the fingers of some who meddled with it rather badly.

Officials, and "red-tapeism" if you will, cannot be abolished, they can at best be regulated. But in the belief that red-tape was responsible for all evils, administrative and other, haste overstepped discretion, the coils that as they were loosened should have been wound up and stored were slipped indiscriminately, and many people got entangled in meshes from which they have never since emerged. Perhaps on this account it would be more correct to compare red-tapeism as a weapon to the net of the Retiary. Certainly, nothing could have better pleased the advocates of a Conservative policy in military affairs, for whilst their adversaries were tearing a passion to tatters over a phrase they gained breathing time. As a natural consequence, when things settled down a little, the main issues were forgotten for a time. These were, of course, the defective administration of our army, and the remedies to be applied. Instead, however, of rebuilding, a good deal of expensive tinkering was indulged in. To the parole "Reform" came the countersign "Money." A good many troublesome taxpayers were silenced thus, whilst a good many more comforted themselves with the reflection that at any rate there would be some return for the outlay. You may stop an aching tooth with gold, but not a running sore, and so much was spent in patching that none was forthcoming for remodelling and rebuilding. Men wandered off into the pleasant side-paths of dilettantism instead of setting their faces and keeping to the straight and troublesome path of duty. The fact was that sops were freely thrown to the public as represented by their delegates. In deference to the somewhat ominous bellowing of John Bull, and in accordance with the prescribed usage when chased by one of the bovine species, the recalcitrants threw away one after another of the superfluous garments of the British soldier. In other words, certain changes of small account were made as regards accoutrements and clothing, designed, if malicious but sometimes "ower true" report speaks correctly, rather to benefit the British tailor.

One good resulted, however, from such alterations as were made, namely, that the comfort of the soldier was a little more considered, and it was seen that his clothing could be adapted to the climate of the country in which he happened to be serving. To record the gradual steps by which men were brought to look at matters in their true light would occupy far more space than we have at our command, but of the predisposing causes we must not omit to record the introduction of breech-loading rifles, necessitating a system of modern tactics, and the enormous armaments which have become the fashion of late years with our Continental neighbours, for all these matters bear upon the subject with which we are dealing, and in this way. They have called attention to the wants and necessities of the private soldier, and to his value. They have shown that we must have more men of a better class, and that to get these we must offer greater inducements. The treatment of the soldier has been much improved, the punishment of the lash has been abolished, the discipline is less severe though it is strict, and the attempt is made to govern more by their reason than by fear. Thus, although every branch of our service has received more or less attention, and the upper ranks some consideration, the really greatest result of all the agitation of the last quarter of a century has been the attention paid to the rank and file of our army. But the problem of how to induce the kind of men we want to join it has not yet been solved, though those who have most carefully considered the subject believe that it is simply a question of money, and that we shall have to come into the labour market and compete there for what we want. But though money is a most convincing argument, and perhaps the most generally understood, it may be some time before we can avail ourselves of it to the necessary extent, and it is easy to show that there are compensating advantages in the better condition of the soldier as compared to that of the mechanic or labourer, and benefits which even the higher money wages of the latter classes do not and indeed cannot enable them to secure. We shall endeavour then to call attention to some of these in a future article.

"ARCHÆOLOGICAL RESEARCHES AT CARNAC IN BRITTANY," by James Miln (D. Douglas, Edinburgh).—In this handsome volume Mr. James Miln describes at length the excavations carried out by him in the last three years at the Bosseno, the line of mounds which most visitors must have noticed in approaching Carnac from the East, and partly, too, at the Mont St. Michel, the little hill—half a mile nearer Carnac than the Mounds—whence the same visitors usually take their first bird's-eye view of the dreary flats from Loc-mariaker to Plouharnel. Once, so the Breton legend ran, these mounds were a settlement of Templars, or "red monks," on whom the country rose at length, and burned both them and their dwelling-houses in the night. The legend has thus much of truth that the remains now brought to light bear evident traces of having been swept by fire, but their date is not that of the Templars, but of far earlier Gallo-Roman days, when the legions of the Cæsars still kept ward along the sea coast of the Morbihan. The Bosseno is, in fact, a good example of the great Roman country house and its dependencies—the villa urbana, or owner's residence, the villa agraria, or dwelling of his work-people, the store-houses and workshops, the baths and private chapel, the smaller houses that grow up around—of which the slighter remains have long been levelled with the ground, the larger, too expensive to remove, have been gradually converted into grass-grown mounds. About Mont St. Michel, on the other hand, the vestiges unearthed were of a different kind; mediæval work on Gallo-Roman, and this again on earlier Celtic—rude specimens of the three great periods which here, as everywhere in Brittany, have left their traces one upon the other. Only, perhaps, a professed archæologist will appreciate to the full the plans and fragments so lovingly arrayed and illustrated by Mr. Miln, the bits of painted plaster and the pot-sherds, the querns and celts and fishers' weights and votive images, however suggestive of superstitions that linger yet among the grandchildren of Cæsar's Veneti. But to the archæological enthusiast, for whose net nothing is too small or too large, the volume should be a very welcome offering, certainly one for which Breton antiquaries should feel no slight gratitude to the Scottish stranger within their gates.

Less a continuous tale of travel than a series of selected pictures, neatly grouped and tastefully sketched by a leisurely wanderer from Turin to Cairo, in its general get-up and illustrations irreproachable, "South by East," by G. F. Rodwell (Marcus Ward and Co., Belfast),—despite an occasional tendency to philosophise in verse and prose after the fashion of Young Academe on its travels—is a decidedly agreeable volume. A cultured observer of the fine things of Art and Nature, Mr. Rodwell has the happy knack of steering cleverly between the two extremes of too much guidebook and too much self, while he imparts a certain freshness to the most familiar scenes by the straightforwardness with which he groups for notice just those things and no more which have impressed him most, or by the readiness with which he turns amidst the wonders of dead Greece and Rome to catch the living sentiment of the day. Some of the chapters have appeared before, notably the sparkling account of modern Athens, and the description of the Tuscan Memorial to Galileo. Of the rest we should be more especially tempted to commend the bright sunny journal of visits to Taormina, Syracuse, and Palermo, and the very interesting list of the état major of that potent army, the church militant of Rome.

The interest now so widely felt in all that relates to Montenegro and the Montenegrins will commend at once to many readers the Rev. W. Denton's compact and comprehensive little volume, "Montenegro, its People and their History" (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.).—As a guide to the wild mountain-lands of the Czernagora and the Berdas, to their tribal divisions and institutions, to the physical features which, even more than the native valour of the highlander, have made the country an impregnable fortress, Mr. Denton possesses the twofold qualifications of personal knowledge of the district and careful study of the best contemporary authorities. As interesting, and to very many possibly more novel, will be found his history of the little State from earliest times, under successive lines of hereditary princes, of prince-bishops, and now, since Danilo I., of secular princes once again; opposing itself in one age to the Ottoman as the trusty ally of Hungary or Venice, in another barely saved by a sort of Sicilian Vespers from succumbing to the treachery of native renegades, in another, matching its rude militia against the trained soldiers of Marmont, or, fifty years later, the Crimean veterans of Omar. Altogether, as a brief popular account of Montenegro, past and present—of events, that is, only recorded in side-notes of history and places only confusedly marked, if marked at all, in any ordinary map—Mr. Denton's is the most serviceable English work with which we are acquainted.

Vol. VI.—The Battle of Inkerman—of the Cabinet Edition of Mr. Kinglake's "Invasion of the Crimea" (Blackwood and Sons) sets cabinet and octavo editions at last abreast. The chief novelty is a fly-page in reply to certain strictures of the Quarterly Review on Mr. Kinglake's account (in Vol. II. of this edition) of Lord Palmerston's exclusion from office, Dec '53, re-affirming its "minute accuracy," and adding, "by no fault of mine has disclosure on this subject been kept within fixed narrow bounds."

"Mortimer Collins: His Letters and Friendships," edited by Frances Collins (2 vols.: S. Low and Co.), will be read by a tolerably large circle with something of a personal interest. For among men who "write," in Thackeray's phrase, "for bread," were few figures better known between '57 and '68 than the tall form of the subject of these volumes, nor did eight years of semi-idyllic retreat amid Berkshire clowns and garden-tortoises, big dogs, and tame robins, make him, though in person more rarely met, a less familiar presence to the thought. It is of these latter years that the volumes edited by Mrs. Collins mainly treat, giving indeed but half a chapter to all the life that went before, but treating of this after time with a minuteness somewhat startling perhaps to those who find their holiday mirth unexpectedly in print, but tempered with such genuine good feeling—good feeling better even than good taste—that none we should think could possibly take offence. Altogether these volumes picture to us Mr. Collins as a more loveable man than the world always gave him credit for being—a big boy in many things to the last, with a boyish affectation of high health and spirits, but with depths of tenderness and reverence in his nature, too, to which some who censured him could make slight pretence. Volumes, we fear, a little overcharged with miscellaneous scraps of prose and verse, but bright with memories of genial days by Berkshire woods and streams, and with ever and again among the hastily-written scraps a verse or thought one would not willingly forget.

Amongst Arctic countries Greenland possesses peculiar interest from its vast extent, its icy and unexplored interior, the Norse remains which stud its seaboard, and its Eskimo inhabitants—members of that roving race who exist in comparative comfort where ordinary men perish. In "Danish Greenland, its People, its Products" (H. S. King), Dr. Henry Rink presents a comprehensive and really valuable account of the chief features of the western coast from Upernavik to Frederiksdal, which has been under Danish sway since Hans Egede formed his missionary station at Godthaab in 1721. Dr. Rink's observations are not drawn from mere cursory visits. He was at one time inspector of South Greenland, and resided there for sixteen winters and twenty-two summers, thus acquiring a thorough knowledge of the country and inhabitants, and his details of the Eskimo life and character leave little to be desired. Few natives who have mixed freely with Europeans show so little alteration from their ancient customs as the Eskimo. True, they have embraced the Christian religion—somewhat modified to admit of their retaining their traditions—have slightly changed their costume, and have adopted such European luxuries as coffee and tobacco, but their mode of existence remains the same, their huts evince no improvement, hunting and fishing continue their main support, and their language is still the original idiom. The Eskimo, however, are apt learners, few being unable to read, and the children regard school as a pleasure. Indeed, one of the most interesting chapters of this work comprises a number of articles written by natives educated at home. The illustrations also are lithographed from drawings made by three Eskimo, and though dubious as regards perspective and guiltless of artistic merit are of far more interest from their quaint truthfulness than more finished and correct pictures. The climate, vegetation, products, trade, and public institutions of the country are alike described with no less care and detail, while the Appendix furnishes complete information as to the Greenland glaciers and geology, a vocabulary of Eskimo words and a list of the Flora and Fauna. Though in some parts almost too technical for the general reader, "Danish Greenland" will prove of considerable importance as a book of reference, and in interest is well worthy of the author of "Tales and Traditions of the Eskimo." Dr. R. Brown has edited the English translation.

"A Tourist's Guide to the Upper Engadine" (E. Stanford), from the German of M. Caviezel—a pretty little guide to the prettiest valleys (when not too crowded) in all Switzerland—seems very complete in every respect. Its great merit—no slight one in our eye—is the space it gives to the many excursions "without guides" that may be made by unambitious tourists from Samaden, Pontresina or any of the chief centres.

Among good shilling's-worths we must certainly include Bacon's New Map of London or Street and Railway Directory (G. W. Bacon and Co., Strand),—the best we think for its price that we have yet seen, and said to contain "500 streets not shown in any other map."

Among smaller volumes on sacred subjects we may mention "Aids to the Study of the Book of Samuel," by E. Hobson, M.A. (W. W. Gardner), a careful analysis of the history, with notes for the use of students. "The Gospel of the Childhood," by Dean Goulburn (Rivingtons and Co.), devotional studies and commentaries on Luke ii. 41 to the end, for the use of children not yet confirmed; and "Footsteps of the Master," by Mrs. H. B. Stowe (S. Low and Co.)—a series of ably written meditations in prose and verse on the incidents in the life of Christ from the childhood to the Ascension, notices of Christ in the Old Testament, in Prophecy, &c.

Transatlantic wit is well appreciated in England, to judge by the increase in American stories brought out in London. Mr. F. Warne publishes a cheap edition of "American Humour: 'Helen's Babies' Series," and heads the list with the well-worn tale which christens the series; No. 2, "Brother Billy," by Mrs. Diaz, depicts the schooldays and mild escapades of a rather ordinary boy and his playmates; while No. 3, "Me—July and August," records the trials of a New York housewife turned farmeress, and is somewhat dull and vulgar, with a strain of forced jocularity running throughout.—"Our Ruth," a Story of Old Times in New England, by Mrs. Prentiss (J. Nisbet), is of a different type, a simple tale of a quiet village, resembling the religious novels of Miss Wetherell. Here the bad personages are duly reclaimed, and become exemplary characters, and the young men, after being lost in the wicked world, come home widowed and in a dying condition, with a helpless infant apiece. The old servant Kezia, who welds her trials and passing events into semi-pious ditties, is specially well drawn.—M. Offenbach's impressions of the Philadelphia Exhibition, "America and the Americans" (W. Reeves), after delighting the Parisians, has now been translated into English. The volume, though very amusing, like its author's music, is of a somewhat superficial character, M. Offenbach having the usual propensity of his adopted countrymen for caricature.

In these days of lightning house-building, when a plot of waste ground is in a few months covered by imposing villas, intending tenants and purchasers will do well to read "The Pleasures of Housebuilding," by J. F. Mackenzie (Routledge), and take warning by the fate of unlucky Mr. Joshua Brown. Attracted by showy exteriors and low prices, many a householder soon finds to his cost that the repairs and dilapidations of his "desirable residence" are stories without end.—From the same publisher comes "Through the Keyhole," by R. Mounteney Jephson, several short sketches fitted for half-an-hour's pleasant light reading.—The productions of several literary Etonians are collected in "Out of School at Eton" (Sampson Low). Though the essays are not of any transcendent merit, they are interesting as a proof that public-school boys may sometimes care for more intellectual recreation than athletic sports, and that they do not always consider that mental exercise should be confined to the class-room.—We have also received a cheap reprint of Mrs. J. H. Riddell's "City and Suburb" (F. Warne).

Holiday-makers in the "Garden of England" this autumn will like the "London, Chatham, and Dover Panoramic Guide" edited by R. Kemp Philp (Bemrose), which briefly describes the chief places on the line.—"The Hotels of Europe (H. Herbert) is a handsome volume cataloguing the hotels in the principal resorts of England and the Continent, and in addition a list of railway and steamship routes, and sixteen excellent maps of European countries.

THE IRISH OBSTRUCTIONISTS

Sir Stafford Northcote's proposal to alter the rules which have so long governed the deliberations of the Legislature was of such an unusual character that it is no wonder that on Friday night last the House was crowded both with members and visitors. The preliminary business was hurried through, and at about half-past four the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having wisely abandoned his original intention of dealing with Mr. Parnell personally, rose to move his Resolutions, the first of which was to the effect that when a member, after being twice declared out of order by either the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees, shall still disregard the authority of the chair, the debate shall be at once suspended, and a motion forbidding him to be again heard during that debate or sitting shall be put without further debate. The second resolution declared that no member should have power to move more than once, during the debate on the same question, either that the Chairman do report progress or that the Chairman do leave the chair, nor to speak more than once to such motion; and that no member who has made one of those motions should have power to make the other on the same question. It is hardly surprising that several hon. members, who cannot be suspected of sympathy with the obstructive policy, should have wished to defer the debate until the following Monday, but these objections were overruled by the House, which decided by 390 votes to 40 to go on with the discussion. Sir Stafford made a very temperate speech in support of his first resolution, remarking that its provisions were only to be temporary, and although they were mild, they were yet sufficiently stringent for use in an assembly of business men actuated by feelings of consideration for others, and by a due sense of the dignity of the assembly to which they belonged. Mr. Sandford proposed, and Mr. Osborne Morgan seconded an amendment, that the resolutions should only take effect when passed by a majority of three-fourths, and the discussion was continued by a number of members, amongst whom were Messrs. Parnell, Biggar, and O'Donnell, the last-named speaker declaring that any country attorney would soon find a dozen ways of evading the Resolution. Mr. Sandford's amendment was negatived without a division, and then came an exciting and amusing scene with Major O'Gorman, who announced that he had three or four amendments to propose, in all of which he intended to take a division. He then went on to speak of the "usual insulting manner" of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, an expression which raised a storm of calls to order, and a stern rebuke from the Speaker, and of course the Major had to withdraw his remark. He then went on to read the Resolution and make his amendment, and, on the Speaker's invitation to put it in writing, he approached the table with three profound bows. After he had been writing for some few minutes, Mr. Biggar proffered his assistance, which was testily declined. The Speaker at length rose, and asked if the document was ready, when the Major, angrily replying, "I can't write faster than I can," walked off to his seat with the unfinished paper. Mr. Sullivan interposed with the remark that this incident did not add to the dignity of the House, and protested against the resolution as putting the Irish members under notice to quit. This brought up Mr. Gladstone, who had not intended to speak, but who expressed his conviction that the object of the whole House was by a fair and equitable course to make the Union which existed on the statute-book one of hearts as well as of laws. Scarcely had Mr. Gladstone sat down ere the Major was up again, asking whether his amendment was not to be entertained. The Speaker blandly replied that he could bring it up, and the reply of the Major, amidst roars of laughter, was, "I can't, sir, it's impossible!" Another amendment was then moved by Mr. Gray, and while this was being discussed Major O'Gorman again rose, and in stentorian tones called upon the English people to be careful of their liberties lest another Cromwell should enter that House, and again order them to "take away that bauble." The rest of the debate was somewhat tedious, amendment after amendment being proposed by the Irish members, apparently for the mere purpose of occupying time. At length the original Resolutions were put and carried by 282 to 32. At a quarter to one on Saturday morning the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved his second Resolution, which was carried by 250 to 7, after about an hour's debate, the only notable incident in which was that Mr. Whalley, while protesting against the motion, was twice called to order by the Speaker, thus being the first to subject himself to the rule which had just been passed.

On Monday The Times published a long letter from Mr. Parnell, in which he defends the obstructive policy pursued by him in relation to the various Bills which he has opposed, and concludes by saying that he is of opinion that the course adopted towards him has been with the deliberate purpose of driving him to obstruction, but he says he will not be driven to that, nor will he refrain from interfering in English or Imperial legislation without a mandate from the Irish people.

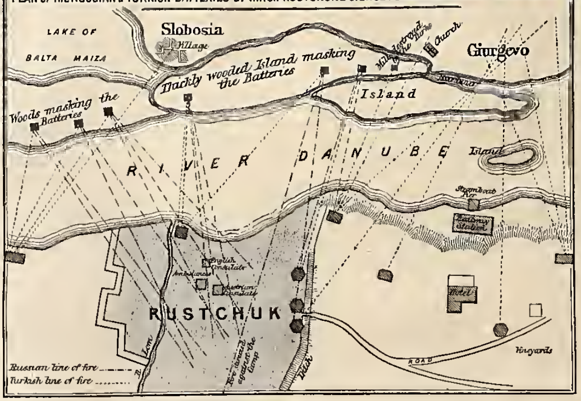
DESPATCH OF TROOPS TO THE MEDITERRANEAN

The departure of the troop-ships Euphrates and Crocodile did not create that sensation in Portsmouth which might have been expected from the sensational announcements which had been made by certain newspapers respecting the intentions of the Government. The first-named vessel had on board nearly 1,500 officers and men, and the Crocodile took away a total of 1,420. They were drafted from various regiments quartered at Aldershot, Colchester, Edinburgh, and the Curragh, and as the leave-takings with wives and sweethearts had been got through at those depôts, the men were much more cheerful than they might have been had the women been allowed to accompany them to the place of embarkation. There was no display, and no marching through the streets. The trains ran right into the Dockyard, to which only a few privileged people were admitted, and went abroad without further ceremony or fuss. Each vessel had a short trial trip before starting for the voyage, in accordance with the new naval regulations. The Euphrates started on Thursday evening, the 26th ult., about seven o'clock, and as she was tugged out of the harbour the first cheer came from the red jackets, who crowded her decks. This was answered from the Crocodile, the Duke of Wellington, and other ships lying in harbour, and also from the jetty and the shore, where a few hundred people had assembled, and as the vessel passed out, one of the military bands on board played "Her bright smile haunts me still," though it would certainly be difficult to guess why that particular air should have been selected. On the Friday the Crocodile bade farewell to the shores of Old England, and the events connected with her departure were simply a repetition of those of the previous day. The cheering was, however, a little more enthusiastic, and the music perhaps more appropriate, the tunes chosen being "Rule Britannia" and "The Girl I Left Behind Me."—Our large sketch represents the Euphrates being towed out stem foremost. "Luncheon on Board" shows the soldiers buying bread, cheese, lemonade, and other things of the bumboat women, and the remaining sketch shows the method of stowing the rifles, which were put away, with bayonets reversed, in the berths which would have been occupied by the soldiers' families had any of their wives and children been allowed to accompany them. The strength of the garrison of Malta about ten years since, before Lord Cardwell's reduction of our military establishments in the colonies, was 5,854 non-commissioned officers and men; the present garrison is 5,098, and the additions now being made will bring it up to 8,100 of all ranks.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF RUSTCHUK

Considerable attention has been attracted to the Russian bombardment of this fortress, and to the ruthless and apparently unnecessary manner in which the Russians shelled the inoffensive quarters of the town, including the Ambulance and British and other Consulates. Last week, also, the definite siege of Rustchuk may be said to have been commenced by the Czarewitch, who is investing the place with two corps d'armée, while a most tremendous cannonading is carried on from the batteries at Slobosia and Giurgevo across the river. The subjoined plan will show the main lines of fire from both Turks and Russians, by which it will be manifest that the shelling of the buildings in the town could hardly be attributed to accident. The nominal breadth of the Danube here is about 800 yards; but during the recent few months the river has been flooded, and accordingly measures nearly a mile across. Rustchuk is situated on the confluence of the Lom river with the Danube, and the river front is irregularly fortified.

PLAN OF THE RUSSIAN & TURKISH BATTERIES BY WHICH RUSTCHUK & GIURGEVO WERE RESPECTIVELY BOMBARDED.



On the land side the town is surrounded by a length of bastion earthwork nearly two miles in length. Numerous forts have been erected on the surrounding hills, so that the total length of the fortified enceinte is six miles. Rustchuk is a place of considerable importance, not only as being the head of the railway from Shumla and Varna, but also of the road to one of the most frequented passes on the Balkans.

SIEGE OPERATIONS AT CHATHAM

The engineering operations which have for several weeks been carried on against the fortifications at Chatham were brought to a fitting climax on Friday last, when a grand assault was made upon them in the presence of H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge. About two hundred men had been engaged since the 4th of June in developing a regular system of mines and countermines, advancing step by step as would be done in actual warfare; the attacking and defending forces being respectively under the command of a Captain of Royal Engineers, who was kept in ignorance of the tactics of his opponent, except in so far as he could have obtained a knowledge of them had he been dealing with a real enemy. The Forts to be attacked were the New Ravelin, Prince Henry's, and Prince Frederick's Bastions. The besiegers had crept forward, constructing parallel after parallel, until, on the day of the final struggle, they were within thirty yards of the covered way in front of the forts. Meanwhile the defenders had not been idle. They had remounted the guns of the New Ravelin and strengthened its inner works, and had made an entrenchment in the gorge of Prince Henry's Bastion.

After a preliminary inspection of the troops and the works, H.R.H. the Commander-in-Chief took up his position upon a lofty platform erected on St. Mary's Casemates, and the strife immediately commenced. The guns and mortars opened fire, and presently a mine was sprung, sending a cloud of smoke, earth, and stones high up in the air. The effect of this was to destroy the counterscarp and immediately a battalion of the 24th Regiment sprung from the advanced trenches and mounted up the slope. Though warmly received, they managed to effect a lodgment on the parapet, whence they kept up a terrible fusilade upon the discomfited defenders of the Ravelin. The attack on Prince Henry's Bastion by the Royal Marines sped not so well, for though they swarmed bravely up the scaling ladders, they were soon driven back into the Ditch, and were fain to beat a precipitate retreat, leaving their ladders behind them. This attack having failed another mine was sprung farther to the left, and then followed a most exciting and dramatic scene. The 30th Regiment and the 5th Fusiliers marching forward with their scaling ladders, leaped down into the Ditch upon the sacks of straw which the Engineers flung in to break their fall, and after a stubborn resistance they succeeded in taking the fort. While the contest was going on the men in the attacking ranks fell thick and fast, and the Army Hospital Corps and Red Cross Knights were seen hurrying thither and thither, binding up arms, heads, and legs and bearing the supposed wounded soldiers away to shelter.

The fight being over, the whole of the forces engaged marched past the Commander-in-Chief, each battalion being headed by its detachment of Engineers carrying trenching tools. Transport wagons went by in "lasso-draught," and the rear was closed by half-a-dozen traction engines, some drawing field-guns, and others a number of trucks loaded with all kinds of military stores. Upon two of these some wag had chalked the significant legend, "To Gallipoli." The entire operations were conducted under the superintendence of Colonel Sir J. Stokes, R.E., K.C.B., and amongst the most notable spectators were the Right Hon. Gathorne Hardy, the Earl of Cadogan, a large number of general officers, and several military attachés belonging to foreign embassies. Our sketches require no explanation beyond that conveyed in their respective titles.

THE ROYAL AND ANCIENT GAME OF GOLF

Vi et arte, the Golfers' motto, seems truly applicable to this fine old game, as strength without skill is of little avail.

In our illustration, the stalwart, bearded Caledonian (at the commencement of the game) seems to make sure of an easy victory over his weaker opponent, but as the game goes on finds to his cost that brute force alone is not sufficient to insure victory, and finally has to succumb to the more skilful play of his weaker opponent.

Mac, the mighty, leads off (closely watched by his wily opponent) with a spanking drive which carries him well over all difficulties, but not so the wily one whose strength has not proved sufficient for the occasion, and who, alas, finds his ball at the base of a dreaded bunker, and imbedded in a tangled mass of vegetation, out of which difficulty he extricates himself, but at a terrible sacrifice, but by steady play, however, as the game goes on is enabled to retrieve his losses, and at the last hole the game stands all even. Now comes the tug of war—"The Last Put." The wily captain closely scrutinises the undulations of the ground, and after mature consideration determines on the course his ball must travel to reach the hole, and prepares for the event, closely watched by Mac, who is in an agony of suspense as he sees his opponent's ball slowly but surely travelling in the right direction and finally disappear.

So skilful a "put" evidently puts the shakers on Mac, who through being over cautious and nervous, plays short, and loses the match by one "put," much to the satisfaction of the captain, who rejoices thereat."

The captain is now declared the winner of the medal, and receives the congratulations of his brother golfers, and his name will now be for ever famous in the archives of the club.

HUNTING THE IMPALPABLE

The first day of July, being "coupon day," is a busy day in the City. The Banks are thronged with those who come to garner on that day the bi-annual fruit that matures in the smoky atmosphere of Lombard Street. And among the busy crowds that continually surge within a stone's throw of the Bank of England at this special time are many elderly gentlemen in old-fashioned swallow-tail coats, and ladies looking grim in their "dividend bonnets," wandering in deep perplexity of mind among the bewildering lanes that intersect Cornhill, Lombard Street, and King William Street, in search of the Banks where their coupons are made payable. I started this year as usual on my pleasant journey East of Temple Bar—carrying with me a small bundle of coupons, wishing heartily as I walked along Cheapside that there were many such days in the calendar. My pleasure received a sudden and unexpected damper by an abrupt intimation given to an old lady at the Bank desk, which I overheard as I stood waiting my turn.

"No instructions!"

"Sir?" I heard tremulously uttered.

"No instructions!" came as clear and hard as the blow of a hammer on a nail. I had twenty coupons in my hand, and felt that by a breath a great part of my poor income had vanished into space. Tears were in the poor lady's eyes as with trembling hands she picked up her coupons and turned to leave the Bank.

"How is this?" I asked, pushing towards the desk with many others who had the same question on their lips.

"Know nothing about it! No instructions!"

"But have you no explanations to offer?"

"If you want explanations, refer to Company."

"Where is the Company?"

"In the Directory."

With which answer I had to back out wrathfully, my rejected coupons in my hand. I had always looked respectfully to the whiskered individual in high starch collars and "stock," a type of solid respectability, whose portrait adorned the corner of my coupons, presumably the founder of the company, but whom I inwardly cursed as he now looked up in my face calmly like the solemn impostor he was. I felt grievously wronged. This was an investment I had not made in any speculative mood of mind. It offered only a moderate return. My old college friend, now a flourishing broker in the City, who was generally believed by his friends to have turned up trumps there, had recommended it as a "good thing" of the non-speculative sort. I did not feel disposed to accept the inevitable without striving to have some light thrown upon the causes of my misfortune and my probable prospects. So I looked up the address of the offices of the company, and went there. At first I was told that it was utterly impossible to see the secretary of the company, that it was useless to take my card to him, but upon my taking a seat and saying decidedly that I meant to remain there until I had seen him, the chances of an interview seemed to increase. By and by a door opened, a head popped out, and a voice said "James!" James entered, and speedily came out to say that the secretary would receive me. The secretary, a dapper little gentleman, fashionably dressed, came to meet me with outstretched hands, and smiling in the most affable manner; "What, Mr. ———, so glad to see you! What, been kept waiting twenty minutes? Am so sorry! James ought to have told me who it was, indeed he ought! And what is the latest from the West End?"

"I came, sir, not to discuss the West End, but to get some explanation of the non-payment of these coupons."

The secretary was seized with a fit of coughing.

"Ah, coupons? Wretched business—we are deeply distressed about these coupons—explanation only too easy—extreme and universal depression of business—flat all round—foreign loans collapsing—mines nowhere—railways 'beared' to death on the flags—telegraphs dwindling to a point—same with every class of investment. Result, reduced dividends."

"This company, so far as I am aware, is neither a foreign loan, a mining concern, a railway company, nor a medium for gambling in telegraph shares——"

"True, true; but have you noticed the depression in produce—cotton, jute, coffee, tea—"

"You have nothing whatever to do with prod—"

"Believe me, I am sorry—have a glass of sherry, Mr. ———? No? Then here is better luck for next half! Yes, I am very sorry, but this is a busy day with me, sir, and you see I have no power. I am only a servant, a mere servant. I can give you no further information. The decision is not mine."

"Who can give me the information, for I mean to have it?"

"You have got all the explanation that can be given. I am sorry. So sorry. The Directors are the men really responsible, you know. I'm only their servant."

"Who are, and where are, your directors?"

He handed me a prospectus. I was speedily on my way to Lancaster Gate to an address given as being the residence of the Chairman of Directors. I was received by a gigantic personage in powder, in livery, and the owner of overpowering calves. "Ya-as," the Honourable ——— was at home, but just sitting down to lunch. It was hardly likely I could see him. My business, I explained, was urgent. I would not detain him many minutes. But the argument which finally carried my card indoors was silvern. I immediately recognised in our "chairman," into whose study I was solemnly ushered, the living original of the bewhiskered individual whose features had been made familiar to me on the corner of my coupons, and on the fore-front of my bon's. He received me with pompous coldness.

"I have come to obtain from you some explanation about those coupons," I said, laying my small bundle of the gentleman's portraits before him.

"Know nothing about them! Do you take my house for a shop—or a public office? This is an unwarrantable intrusion, sir!"

"I beg your pardon—I understand that is a lithograph of your signature—a reproduction of your features, sir—you are in some manner connected with this concern, whether you take any interest in it or not."

"If you wish information, the place to get it is the public office of the company, not here. But I have personally no longer any interest in the matter. I am neither a shareholder of the company, nor in any way connected with it. I resigned office as chairman some time ago. Good morning! John, show this gentleman to the door."

I was bowed out, no wiser than when I entered. I called upon five of the seven directors whose names were on the prospectus, but the only information I could obtain from the two whom I saw (one of them I caught in the lobby of the House of Commons) was—"You really must refer to the secretary of the company. We have no longer any interest in it. We resigned some time ago."

The "some time ago" proved on inquiry to be the previous week. I found on returning to the office of the company that the secretary had in the interval become much flushed in the face by argument under difficulties with irate shareholders, perhaps aided by frequent reference to the decanter "for better luck next half." The burden of his song was still, uttered in rather a muddy voice, "Am sho shorry—but I'm only a sher-vant—a mere sher-vant."

Nor, when I came to examine the matter more closely, did I find that the fruit merely was blighted, the tree itself was dead. The clerk of my college friend (he, happy man, is at present on a tour in the United States) in answer to my question as to the price of the bonds, summed that up in one significant word, "unsaleable!"

Monday, July 2nd, was a hot day in the City, and my warmth as the sun threw shadows across Lombard Street was of a kind that no cool drinks could alleviate. Before returning home I looked in upon my solicitor, who has once or twice helped me out of scrapes by the wisdom and moderation of his counsel. He shook his head as I handed him my coupons and the prospectus.

"The old story—'a fool and his money are soon parted'—I beg your pardon, old man; this is a case for sympathy, not for advice. You are not alone in your misfortune; but before you can take action with any hope of success you must get two-thirds of your fellow-shareholders to work with you—a task more easily recommended than carried out. Take the portrait of that old wolf on the coupon home—frame it—stick it upon your bed-room chimney-piece—let it be a beacon of warning to you and your children, when you have any, for evermore!"

Murmuring "Heigho, so ends Aunt Bertha's legacy!" I wandered slowly westward a sadder if not a wiser man. J. S.

THE RHINE THIRTY YEARS AGO, AND NOW

THOSE who recollect the Rhine thirty years ago, and have recently visited it again, must be struck with the great changes which have taken place upon the banks of this most beautiful river. The writer not only distinctly remembers the Rhine in the year 1847, when he had the good fortune to spend several months upon a tour up the river, but has, from time to time, noted down the changes, the so-called "improvements" which have been effected, and, alas! the undoubted works of destruction, which have taken place from year to year.

Thirty years ago, as now, the most agreeable way of visiting the Rhine was to take the steamboat from London, drop quietly down the Thames, sleep on board, if one's digestive organs were not too much disturbed, and on waking find one's self in the Scheldt early next morning.

Little is changed in the fine view of Antwerp from the Scheldt, the exquisite tower of the cathedral and the lofty roofs and turrets of the surrounding churches still present to the eye the same matchless group which they did thirty years ago. I recollect being then greatly amused by a London footman on board the steamboat, who was pointing out to two admiring lady's-maids the most prominent objects in this beautiful view; he had visited Antwerp before, and was looked upon by his companions as a great authority. His lecture ran somewhat as follows:—"There Miss Simmins, them two great churches as you hobserve stands hup on either side of the cathedral is St. Jeen's (Jean), and St. Jack's (Jacques). I can't, at this here distance, say izackly which is which; but, you know, 'Jeen's' means 'James's' and 'Jack's, of course, is 'John's!'"

If the general aspect of Antwerp is unchanged within the last thirty years, the same cannot be said of Cologne. Those who recollect the beautiful old picturesque Cologne of thirty years back can scarcely believe their eyes when they look upon the busy thriving town of to-day. Everything seems changed, some things certainly for the better. Coleridge would no longer have to turn up his nose at the smells in the streets, but if the nose gains by the changes which have taken place, the eye, alas, seeks in vain the charming picturesque combinations of old churches, gabled houses, crumbling walls, and towers which used to delight painters thirty years ago. Where are the charming little bits which fed the portfolios of Prout and the Stanfields? But we shall be told, "Have you not, in exchange for all this, the nearly completed cathedral?" Yes, we have it, and certainly the perspective of the interior is very noble, but who would not sooner see the exterior as it used to be, with its charming old grey stone walls, covered with orange lichens, its grand isolated tower, with its weird-looking old crane, with trees and grass growing amongst the crannies of the decayed stonework surrounding it? Who does not regret the old red-brick retaining-wall which supported the apse and its noble buttresses, and who does not utterly condemn the detestable terrace, with its nasty little colonnade, and the pimping little fountain which occupies the place of this grand old wall? Cologne Cathedral had formerly such a noble exterior, so beautiful, so interesting, and so romantic that it seemed almost impossible to spoil it; those, however, who thought so, little knew the capabilities of German architects. What with the vast Brummagem Gothic railway bridge at the east end, with its sham "machicolations," battlements, loop holes, &c., all to defend what?—why nothing!—what with the cast iron turret placed over the centre of the church, where, be it recollected, the ancient architects had intended a light stone lantern-tower; what with the ridiculous terrace with which the building has been surrounded, which is arranged in such a way that the mighty buttresses look at a distance as though they were standing upon puny little columns, like an elephant upon caterpillar's legs; what with the hideous disproportioned ridge-cresting and clumsy finials, Cologne Cathedral has, under the fostering care of modern German architects, descended almost from the sublime to the ridiculous—at least as far as its exterior is concerned. Fortunately, the interior gave no scope for "originality," so that here we may see the intentions of the old architects carried out.

We must, however, hurry on past Bonn, which, as seen from the Rhine, now seems to consist of nothing but hotels, to the first glimpse of the seven mountains (Sieben Gebirge), when, oh, horror! "Obstupui, steteritque comam, et vox faucibus hæsit." At the foot of the "Seven Mountains," well defined, in the foreground, are what? Alas, reader, that I should have to tell it, seven factory chimneys vomiting forth black smoke! On again past Andernach, which is little changed, we come to Coblenz, which has suffered terribly from a picturesque point of view, though modern improvers have still left us the ancient Mosel-bridge and the remains of the old palace of the Archbishops of Trèves. But what is this neat-looking little modern town with its white, fresh painted hotels, looking like a miniature Brighton on the Rhine? Why, can this be Boppard? Where are the matchless groups of black oak gables? Where the ruined walls and gates? Where the singular bridge which connected the twin towers of the fine old church? The walls and houses have been all "improved" away, and an "eminent" German architect was sent from Berlin, who at once condemned the curious bridge which united the towers of the church "because it was of a later date than the thirteenth century!"

St. Goar is no longer the pretty village it was thirty years ago, and St. Goarhausen, which so delighted Prout, and afforded so many "copies" for drawing-masters, is now an uninteresting hamlet, with a Cockney Gothic church, which is enough to give an air of vulgarity to everything within two miles of it.

Thank heavens! Oberwesel is as yet safe. Its exquisite tower and beautiful churches are still "unrestored" and surrounded by gables.

The same, however, cannot be said of Baccarach, which is nearly as much ruined as Boppard. Rudesheim, which formerly presented to the Rhine a lofty old wall, defended by quaint and beautiful towers, was robbed of all interest and shut out from sight by a hideous railway embankment. Between here and Mainz the towns appear to have been nearly rebuilt, and the cathedral at Mainz has lost its beautiful eastern lantern which is replaced by a vast modern "extinguisher."

I have not yet, however, mentioned the most terrible of all the modern plagues which have beset the Rhine, and that is the rage for "restoring" the old castles. Ever since the late King of Prussia bought the ruins of Stoltzenfeltz and "restored" them with cardboard tracery for the windows and lath and plaster turrets, a rage has set in for copying this brilliant example of refined taste, and thus year by year the old "ruined" castles upon the Rhine give way to sham Gothic restorations remarkable only for their vulgarity and absurdity. How singular is it that people can be found who are foolish to prefer the sham antique to the real antique!

The Rhine is still a beautiful and most interesting river, but its chief beauties are unrevealed to the tourist who hurries along it on board the express steamer in August or September. He who would really see this river must take knapsack on back and walk along its banks in late April, or May, and, we will answer for it, he will not be disappointed; but I may almost as positively predict that the tourist who, for the first time, sees the Rhine in August or September, will return home with the fixed conviction that all those who have written or sung its praises have either deluded themselves or attempted to deceive others by errors, exaggeration, and false enthusiasm.

MOCKING-BIRDS are becoming so scarce in Virginia, that the inhabitants are forbidden to capture a single specimen for the next six years, except the bird should be found on their own premises, and then they must keep it themselves and not sell it.

ENGLISH TAPESTRY will be well represented at the Paris Exhibition next year by contributions from the Tapestry Manufactory at Windsor, which will send a series of cartoons illustrating The Merry Wives of Windsor, and a portrait of the Queen.

A NUMBER OF ANIMALS intended for zoological collections in England are on their way to this country, and have been breaking the journey at the Paris Jardin d'Acclimatation in the Bois de Boulogne. There are four young elephants, sixteen camels, three rhinoceros, nine giraffes, six buffaloes, an ostrich, and thirteen little ones, two Asian goats, and nine antelopes, the whole collection being in the charge of fourteen Abyssinian negroes.

THE LIGHTHOUSES on the Atlantic coasts of the United States cause the destruction of about 100,000 birds annually, the birds being attracted by the light and flying against the glass and being dashed to pieces. The migratory birds are the chief sufferers, the havoc being great in April along the northern coasts, from Cape May to Maine, and in October on the Florida shores. At one lighthouse in Florida the lantern itself was broken by the repeated shocks from ducks, and an iron network had to be erected round the light. Even then the ducks struck the netting with such force as to break through it and smash the heavy outer plate glass of the lantern. From twenty to fifty dead birds were often found in the morning.

ONE OF THE HIGHEST MOUNTAINS OF THE BOLIVIAN ANDES, Illimani, has been successfully scaled for the first time by M. Charles Wiener, a French explorer sent on a scientific mission by the Government. Illimani is 21,150 feet above the level of the sea, and is the third loftiest peak of the chain, Sorata and Gualtieri being respectively 21,290 feet and 22,000 feet in height. An American traveller, Mr. Gibbon, had previously attained a height of 13,500 feet, but the summit had never been reached until the 19th of May last, when M. Wiener, accompanied by a young Peruvian and an engineer, stood upon the peak and christened it the "Pic de Paris." A description of the ascent was sealed up in a glass tube and buried on the summit. This ascent is specially interesting, considering that the peak Chimborazo of the neighbouring Andes of Ecuador has never been ascended beyond 19,695 feet above the sea level.

CARDSHARPERS IN MARSEILLES have adopted an ingenious method of adding to their gains. In many of the secret gambling houses of the town business men who can spare half-an-hour rush in for a brief game of roulette, baccarat, &c., and do not stop to leave their hats or umbrellas outside. The sharpers also keep their hats and umbrellas, and lean the latter against the table, while by a slight movement of the elbow they manage to edge sundry odd napoleons off the edge into the open folds. A rich harvest is often reaped by these Chevaliers du Parapluie. Anent gamblers, the word "Greek" is applied in France, as in England, to all such light-fingered gentry, and certain thin-skinned Hellenes are protesting energetically against the adaptation of their national appellation to such a disreputable class. According to the police records there are 22,000 cardsharpers at large in the various European countries, France containing 5,000, Italy 2,500, Germany 2,000, and England and Austria 1,500 apiece.

AN INTERESTING ANTIQUARIAN DISCOVERY has been made in Denmark, near Storeheddinge, in Zealand, where a large tumulus has been found which is supposed to form part of an ancient regal burying-place. The tomb, surrounded by large stones, contained the body of a woman, who had evidently been buried in her clothes, and who lay with her face turned to the east, her left arm crossed over her chest, and the other arm stretched out. Round the neck of the skeleton was a large embossed gold ring, two similar small circlets were on her fingers, several silver buckles were close to the waist, and near the head was a gold coin which had been an earring, and which dated from the time of the Roman Emperor Probus, who reigned between 276—282. The tomb, therefore, cannot be older than 276. Bones of fish and animals were found in various vessels, as well as human remains, supposed to be those of slaves who had been sacrificed, but the most interesting objects were several coloured glass vases and cups, notably a blue glass cup, with a chased silver rim, representing vine leaves, and bearing a Greek inscription "Farewell." This is the first Greek inscription discovered in Scandinavia, and is considered to be of great importance as proving the early existence of relations between the north and south. The Danish Government intends to make further researches.

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The repulse of the Russians at Plevna, where, on the 21st ult., and again on Monday and Tuesday, Osman Pasha defeated General Krudener, seems temporarily to have checked the Russian advance, and to have led them to adopt a more cautious line of attack than heretofore. The Turks also are now showing signs of decided energy, for Mehemet Ali, the new Commander-in-Chief, with his Prussian blood, is a widely different man from poor old bed-ridden Abd-ul-Kerim, whose conduct emulated that of the cowardly captain in one of Captain Marryat's novels. "Sir," reported the officer of the watch, coming down into his chief's cabin, "one of the enemy's sail is in sight." "Report her to me when she comes closer," was the reply. This was duly done, and a similar answer again returned. "The vessel is sheering off, sir," was the next report. "Very well, then, report her to me when she is out of sight," complacently remarked the gallant commander, whose apathy has been most faithfully copied by the Turkish generals until within the last fortnight. Now, however, a great change is visible, and the Russians are meeting with energetic resistance from three quarters—from Osman Pasha at Plevna, from Mehemet Ali, who is advancing from Osman Bazar, and from Suleiman and Reouf Pashas south of the Balkans, at Adrianople and Yeni Saghra.

To resume our chronicle of events: General Krudener renewed his attack on Plevna on Monday and Tuesday, and again failed, Osman Pasha subsequently following up his advantage by reoccupying Loftcha. The battle on Tuesday seems to have ended in the total defeat of the Russians, but the Turkish report, which states that the enemy lost 8,000 killed and 16,000 wounded, is probably greatly exaggerated. On Saturday a battle is said to have been fought near Rustchuk, where the Czarevitch defeated Ahmed Eyoub, with considerable loss. The truth of this news, however, is to be doubted, as also is a similar report from south of the Balkans, where Suleiman Pasha is represented as having sustained a severe defeat last week. It is a fact, however, that on the 27th Mehemet Ali commenced his forward march from Shumla, and next day re-occupied Osman Bazar, whence by last accounts he was still advancing. Thus the Russians are proceeding far more cautiously throughout the line. North of the Balkans the straggling detachments of the Russian army are being concentrated into compact bodies in readiness for some decisive fighting, while in order to set free a large number of Russian troops, the Roumanians, under General Manu, have at last been allowed to cross the Danube and occupy Nikopol. We have above enumerated the three chief Turkish armies in the field, whose plan of campaign as at present developed appears pretty clear. Mehemet Ali, with 120,000 men, is trying to effect a junction with Osman Pasha, who is credited with 65,000 men, in order to cut the Russian forces in two parts, leaving Suleiman Pasha and his 57,000 men to deal with those south of the Balkans. The Russians are accordingly suspending their forward advance, and are awaiting Mehemet Ali in the plains round about Tirnova, where they are prepared to give him battle. Their reverses have caused considerable alarm and excitement in Roumania, where it is feared that General Gourko, who only has some 20,000 men across the Balkans, will be cut off from head-quarters. The Turks have lost an energetic officer in Aziz Pasha, who was killed last week during a skirmish near Shumla.

Of General Zimmerman and his 40,000 men in the Dobrudscha we hear very little beyond that he is probably waiting upon the rear of Mehemet Ali. The Russians are methodically establishing a regular Christian government in each occupied town, and the first Russian law has now been proclaimed in Bulgaria. By this Christians are freed from the military exemption tax, while tithes are abolished from the 1st of January, 1878, when they are to be replaced by a tax paid in cash, for which, however, only Russian paper money will be accepted, Turkish paper money being declared worthless.

Atrocity reports continue to pour in from both sides, and while they must in both cases be taken with very many grains of salt, there is no doubt that great unnecessary cruelties are practised upon both sides, although the Paris correspondent of The Times on Wednesday gave some curious information regarding atrocity-manufacturing which if correct reflects little credit upon the Turkish Government, and still less upon the correspondents, who in order to obtain facilities promise to send home anything the authorities please to dictate. Colonel Wellesley also has addressed to the British Government a categorical denial of the cruelties attributed to the Russians, while General Kemball curtly telegraphs a denial of the asserted Russian cruelties at Ardahan.

At CONSTANTINOPLE there has been another Ministerial change. Aarifi Pasha, the new Foreign Minister, has resigned, being replaced by Server Pasha. A more noteworthy incident, however, is the dismissal by the Sultan of the Sheik-ul-Islam, and his appointment of Cara Effendi to that important post. The change is said to have been made on account of the ex-Sheik refusing to consent to the unfolding of the Standard of the Prophet; but although the new Sheik is declared to be a great bigot, and to be willing to take this extreme step, an address from him has been read in all the mosques recommending to the Mohammedans calmness and resignation, and the avoidance of acts of hostility towards the Christians. There has naturally been a great panic at Constantinople on account of the Russian advance, and many Christian families are leaving, but the reports of Osman Pasha's victories have done much to calm the alarm. The Sultan is said to be determined upon resistance to the last, and is reported to have threatened to retire into Asia should the Russians succeed in taking Adrianople—a threat probably intended to frighten England into affording some serious assistance. Redif and Abd-ul-Kerim Pashas are now awaiting their court-martial, which Mahmoud Damad is said to be intriguing to prevent.

In ASIA there appears to have been a good deal of desultory fighting between detachments from Mukhtar Pasha's army and Russian flying companies, but no really noteworthy conflict is recorded. The Black Sea fleet are continuing their innocuous cruise, and the Russians are now taking the offensive in maritime affairs. Thus on the Danube gallant Lieutenant Dovbassoff, with a steamer and two sloops, has been bombarding the Turkish camp near Silistria and setting a monitor on fire; while in addition to a fruitless boat expedition against some Turkish vessels off the Crimean coast there has been an engagement off Kustendjie between an old merchant steamer, the Vesta, commanded by Captain Baraboff, and a Turkish monitor, in which the latter appears to have been worsted, the Vesta herself however being greatly damaged. The affair is of some importance as showing that an unarmoured vessel can on occasion hold her own against an ironclad, and succeed in giving as hard knocks as she receives. —In MONTENEGRO the Prince is rapidly advancing, and Nicksics is being actively bombarded. The water supply is cut off, and the garrison have been twice summoned to surrender.

AUSTRIA has decided upon taking a very important step, and after repeated Cabinet Councils Count Andrassy has at length been authorised "to make such military preparations as he may deem necessary, and to call for funds should he require them without again assembling the Council,"—in short, to begin the mobilisation of the army. Of course mobilisation does not necessary mean war, and it is denied that there is any intention of occupying Bosnia, but the bare fact evidences that Austria is ready to proceed to hostilities in certain eventualities. What those eventualities really are can only be surmised. It is unlikely that they have—as is asserted by some journals—anything to do with the presence of Midhat Pasha, who is said to have made his peace with the Sultan, and to have been authorised to go round the Courts of Europe—not to secure alliances, but to sound the intentions of the various Courts.

FRANCE.——Marshal MacMahon duly visited Bourges on Sunday, and his speech, together with the excessive adulation with which he was received by the authorities of the town, has given rise to plenty of discussion. In his speech he said little that he has not said before, and reiterated his determination to "march on the ground of the Constitution at the head of all parties," "in order to ward off the Radicalism which is our common peril." He declared that "public good sense" has already given their due to the many "calumnies" regarding the intentions of his Government, and that they would not prevent him finishing his task with "the co-operation of the men who have been the devoted auxiliaries of his policy." He relied upon the nation to respond to his appeal, and by the choice of its new representatives to end a conflict "the prolongation of which could only injure its interest, and hinder the peaceful development of its greatness." This last phrase has been interpreted into a threat to carry out his anti-Republican policy whatever majority the country may return at the elections. Had the crisis not been so serious the speeches of the authorities would have created considerable amusement. The Archbishop affected to regard him as specially delegated by Heaven to restore to France her "old days of prosperity and glory;" the Mayor likened him to one of the old arbiters, who by "extending their respected arms towards the scene of combat, stopped the engagement or imposed a truce" (the Mayor evidently forgot the Marshal's gouvernement de combat); the President of the Departmental Council called the Marshal the "Head given to the nation by Providence;" while to crown all the President of the Court of Appeal remarked that the "civil power alone being unable to secure peace and domestic tranquillity, if the latter were menaced by criminal enterprises, the magistracy regarded the brave army placed under the Marshal's orders as the best guardian of independence and liberty." Such an utterance from a judge, one of the highest emblems of "civil power," has naturally called forth a burst of ironical laughter from the Republicans.

In the meantime preparations for the elections are busily going on on both sides, and the divisions in the Conservative camp are becoming more and more marked. The Cabinet is openly at war with the Bonapartists and have thrown out a feeler to the Left Centre by a "communicated" article to the Conservative journals stating that the Marshal would gladly associate with such Conservative Republicans as M. Dufaure. The Cabinet are busy drawing up their list of candidates, and enacting fresh decrees for the prevention of Radical propaganda, their last order being that the proceedings of all tobacconists are to be watched, and if any should prove obnoxious the offender, who through the Government monopoly of the manufacture of tobacco is de facto in Government employ, is to have his licence cancelled.

The chief topic of the day, however, is a split in the Bonapartist camp, and a sharp wordy war between MM. Rouher and Cassagnac in their respective journals, the Pays and the Ordre. It appears that M. Rouher is dissatisfied with the Government for not allotting a large majority of the official candidatures to the Bonapartists, a proceeding to which the other members of the "Conservative Union," the Orleanists and Legitimists, naturally object. He therefore threatens to withdraw from the coalition, and proposes that his party should start a Bonapartist campaign on their own account. To this M. de Cassagnac roundly objects, and counselling prudence and conciliation, declares that now the Prince Imperial is of age he no longer feels bound to obey the Regency of which M. Rouher was the head and chief. Thence has ensued a serious family quarrel, which the Republicans are contemplating with great delight. The two parties are called the "Old" and the "New" Bonapartists, the latter priding themselves upon being very faithful sons of Mother Church, so much so, indeed, that for her sake M. de Cassagnac has actually given up duelling.

There is little from Paris byond more Press prosecutions, the Lanterne, Mot d'Ordre, and Courrier de France being this time the victims.—A M. Théobald Chartran has corried off the Prix de Rome for painting, the subject being the invasion of the Roman Senate by the Gauls.—There has been one first representation—Le Dernier Klephte, a dull one-act comedy, at the Folies Dramatiques.—The woman Gras and her accomplice Gaudry have been respectively condemned to fifteen and ten years' imprisonment; and the gros lot of 4,000*l*. of the Paris loan has been gained by a gunner of Avignon.

UNITED STATES.——The great railway strike is virtually over, and the various railways have been one by one resuming work during the week. Last week there was a serious collision at Chicago between the troops and the mob, which however ultimately resulted in the defeat of the latter, the soldiers chasing the people with drawn sabres and the artillery firing grape-shot, twenty-one persons being killed and ninety wounded. The Erie operatives have yielded, and work has been resumed on the line, as also on the Baltimore and Ohio line, whose managers, as the men refuse to come to terms, have procured other operatives. By aid of the military, who are stationed at various important places, traffic has been resumed on the Pennsylvania Railway, and the whole country is gradually being restored to its normal quietude. The War Office closed for the first time since the movement on Monday night, and on Tuesday the Secretary of War issued orders that there should be no further movements of Federal troops unless fresh troubles broke out. On Tuesday night there was another conflict on the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, which, however, was quelled by General Getty and 500 troops, while on the previous day the strike at Columbus broke out afresh, the blockade, however, being definitively broken on Wednesday. There seems some prospect of trouble with the miners, some 30,000 of whom have struck for an increase of wages, and who are letting the mines become seriously flooded, so that a large force of troops has been sent to Luzerne County. At Scranton the disturbances were renewed on Wednesday, and the mayor was shot.

INDIA.——The famine reports are still exceedingly gloomy, and a terrible scarcity is expected throughout Southern India—a district where the extent of area, the want of means of communication, the manner in which the vast population is scattered, and the variety of native dialects, render all methods of conveying and distributing relief exceedingly difficult and problematical, so that, as Lord Salisbury remarked last week, if these gloomy anticipations are fulfilled, a "terrible mortality" may be expected, and the resources of the country will be taxed to the utmost. During the last week the rainfall was exceedingly scarce, except in Bengal, Burmah, Assam, and part of the central provinces and Rajpootana, and great anxiety was felt throughout the country.—There has been a disturbance amongst some Pathan coolies at Quetta, and Lieut. Henson has been murdered.—The present Sir Jamsetjee-Jeejeebhoy has been unanimously elected head of the Parsee community in the place of his father the late Sir Jamsetjee-Jeejeebhoy.

THE COURT

THE Queen is expected to arrive in the Highlands about the 21st inst. Meanwhile, Her Majesty remains at Osborne with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, receiving few visitors and taking her usual walks and drives. On Saturday, Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Montagu Corry arrived and dined with the Queen, Her Majesty also giving an audience to Lord Beaconsfield. Next morning the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended service at Osborne. Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Corry dined with Her Majesty in the evening, and left on Monday for London. Prince Leopold during the day went out for a short cruise in the Alberta.

The Prince of Wales has been staying at Goodwood this week, the Princess remaining at Marlborough House to nurse her son. Last week Prince and Princess Christian lunched at Marlborough House, and on Monday Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne had luncheon with the Prince and Princess of Wales. In the morning the Prince gave a sitting to Mr. Watts, who is painting the Prince's portrait for the Benchers of the Middle Temple, and in the evening he dined with Lady Waldegrave and Lord Carlingford at Strawberry Hill. The Princess drove out in the afternoon with her three little girls and Prince George. On Tuesday the Prince left town for Goodwood, where he arrived in time to be present at the first race. He stayed with the Duke and Duchess of Richmond during the meeting, and is expected back in town at the end of the week.—Prince Albert Victor is going on favourably, and no danger is apprehended. The young Prince's illness is supposed to have been contracted at Sandringham. During the recent stay of the Prince and Princess and their family the waterworks, which were reorganised after the Prince of Wales' illness, had got out of order, and some water was drawn from an old source, and to this is attributed the present attack, but although many other persons have partaken of the suspected water, none have suffered but the young Prince.

Prince and Princess Christian visited Farningham on Saturday, when the Princess laid the corner stone of the new workshops and stores belonging to the Home for Little Boys, and presented prizes to the boys. A luncheon was afterwards given, Prince Christian presiding.—Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne have gone to Germany. They crossed the Channel on Tuesday in the ordinary mail packet from Dover to Ostend.

King Alphonso of Spain is ill from a feverish attack occasioned by cold.—Prince Amadeus, Duke of Aosta, ex-King of Spain, met with a bad accident on Saturday. The horses of his carriage ran away, and the Prince jumped out and seriously injured his head. He is now, however, going on well.—The Emperor of Germany is at Gastein for the waters, and is considerably the better for his visit. He leaves on Monday.—The Imperial Prince and Princess of Germany, who are still at Ostend, went to Antwerp last week. The King and Queen of the Belgians met them at Malines, and accompanied them to the Cathedral, Museum, and other sights at Antwerp.—General Grant is in Switzerland, and last week laid the foundation stone of an American Church at Geneva.

CHURCH NEWS

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.——Dr. Pope was chosen President for the year by 205 votes against 162 recorded in favour of Dr. Rigg, and 39 for Mr. Coley; Mr. Jenkins and Dr. Williams securing but two each. On Thursday, last week, Dr. Pope delivered his opening address, saying that he believed the Head of the Church had summoned that Conference to consider matters relative to His people, and that as really as were the elders of Miletus called together by Paul. The Master's summons and the Master's presence were the sole ground of ecclesiastical authority. Without this, the fact of their being the largest and purest Presbyterian body in Christendom would be unavailing. On the same day a deputation from other Nonconformist bodies waited upon the Conference, and presented an Address of Welcome to Bristol, where John Wesley built his first chapel. This was acknowledged in suitable terms by the President, and in the afternoon the Rev. E. M. Marvin, one of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church (South), United States, was introduced. He stated that the Southern Church had about 700,000 members, and issued eleven weekly newspapers, besides a multitude of books and periodicals, and owned eleven colleges and one university. They had been chastened by the war, and now prosperous times were come again; they had a Conference of twenty native Indian ministers, a German Mission in Texas, and another in Mexico, and they had been the first to introduce lay representatives. The greater part of Friday and Saturday was taken up with the reading of the obituaries of ministers who had died during the year, and solemn consideration as to which of those records should be published. Next came the private debate on "Ministerial Characters," in which every minister's name is called out, and the questions are put, "Are there any objections to him?"

"Does he believe and practise Methodist doctrines?" "Does he faithfully administer discipline?" "Has he ability and health sufficient for the work?" On Wednesday upwards of seventy junior ministers were ordained, the President, ex-President, and other ministers taking part in the ceremony of the imposition of hands. The ex-President, the Rev. A. M'Aulay, delivered an impressive charge, pointing out the spiritual dangers to which his hearers would be exposed, and reminding them of their duties towards the members of their flocks. The next Conference is to be held at Bradford, where accommodation will be provided for 400 ministers.

The Shanghai Missionary Conference.——Difficulties of transit, and the comparative paucity of the number of missionaries in China, would only a few years ago have rendered impossible such an assemblage as that which was gathered together at Shanghai for fifteen days during the month of May last. As it was, the Conference was a complete success, representatives of all the Protestant Missionary bodies in China were present, and numbers of persons met face to face who, though engaged in the same good work, were hitherto known to each other only by reputation. No less than 130 delegates were present, of whom forty-five were ladies engaged in Mission work. The proceedings opened on May 10th with an impressive sermon by Dr. Talmage, of Amoy, on the "Work of Missions." Of the subsequent transactions of the Conference want of space prevents us from giving more than the barest outline, but those who desire further particulars will find them in the English Independent of July 5th and 19th. The remarks of Dr. Williamson, of Chefoo, on the magnitude of the field of labour in China, are especially interesting. "China," he said, "is like eighteen Great Britains placed side by side. It produces everything for life and luxury. There is twenty times as much coal as in all Europe, and iron ore is always near at hand. No part of the world can be compared to it, except the Western States of America. We are face to face," he added, "with a country whose people, if scattered over the earth, would seem to fill it, for every third man we meet would be a Chinaman. They are just arising like a mighty giant from sleep, and in that drowsy state do not know how to act or where to go. Our little band of preachers has to deal with this vast host." On a subsequent occasion the opium trade was discussed, and some startling statistics were given. In Soochow alone two-and-a-half millions of dollars are spent yearly on the drug. Two-thirds of the people smoke opium, and there are from 5,000 to 8,000 dens in the city. Both heathens and Christians in China concur in regarding opium smoking as a most serious evil, and the Conference concurred in a resolution that the trade is deeply injurious both to India, China, and England. The last subject we shall mention is that of "Ancestral Worship," ably treated by Mr. Yates, of Shanghai. "This singular belief," he said, "in a sacred alliance between the living and the dead is a bar to progress and civilisation, and a far greater obstacle to the reception of Christianity than the worship of idols."

Various.—— Dr. Thorold was enthroned in Rochester Cathedral on Friday last by the Archdeacon of Canterbury in person, but the ceremony lost much of its impressiveness owing to the meagre attendance. The clergy attached to the Cathedral were of course present, but besides these there were not more than thirty clergymen in surplices, and very few of the laity. On Sunday the new Bishop preached his first sermon in the Cathedral.—Dr. Pusey, writing to the Daily Express, blames the Exeter branch of the English Church Union for denouncing that paper as "denying a fair hearing to the Catholic cause," and says that "more harm has been done to 'the Catholic cause' by letters written in newspapers than would be done by twenty 'Church Associations.' Since 'the meek,' we are told, 'shall inherit the earth,' such letters are not title-deeds to it."—The Middlesex magistrates have resolved to call upon the Rev. J. W. Horsley either to retire from the Holy Cross Society, of which he is a member, or to resign his office as chaplain of the Clerkenwell House of Detention. In the event of his refusing to do either he is to receive three months' notice to leave.—Early on Sunday morning some of the communicants at St. James's, Hatcham, attended a special celebration of the Holy Communion at the church of St. Peter, London Docks, and were subsequently entertained by the Sisters of Mercy at the Mission-house in Calvert Street. Mr. Lowder was present, and expressed the pleasure with which he had been able to extend his sympathy and assistance to the "cast-out communicants" from Hatcham. The offertory at the special service is to be presented to the Rev. Arthur Tooth.—On Saturday the Bishop of St. Alban's reopened the restored church of St. Lawrence, Blackmore, one of the oldest ecclesiastical edifices in Essex, and in an address to the parishioners adverted to the neglect of the decent and proper observance of Divine worship which had for many years until recently prevailed. The Church Restoration movement, which had now spread from one end of the land to the other, was not a mere restoration of wood, stone, brass, and iron, but everywhere men had been sensible of the blessedness of the spiritual change.—The Scotch papers report the death at Amoy of the Rev. Carstairs Douglas, LL.D., the distinguished Oriental scholar, and senior missionary in China of the Presbyterian Church of England. Dr. Douglas, who was a brother of Principal Douglas, of the Free Church College, Glasgow, was fifty-five years of age, and was the compiler of a Chinese Dictionary of great value.

Her Majesty's Theatre.——On Saturday, the closing night of the season, the opera was Il Flauto Magico. Got up evidently in a hurry, there were many shortcomings in the general performance, but Mozart's delicious music—an uninterrupted succession of rhythmic tunes, the one more charming than the other—atoned for all. The scenery was a jumble of Assyrian buildings (Semiramide) and English bits of landscape—the Euphrates and the Thames, instead of the Nile. The costumes were what, in the absence of a more comprehensive term, may be denominated hybrid. In fact, the traditional "Egyptian" was nowhere. Nor was the cast of the leading characters altogether satisfactory, and yet the performance gave evident pleasure to a crowded audience, all of which must be laid to the credit of the "divine Mozart," whose Orphean melody is fairly irresistible. The curious, however, came rather to test the capacity of Mr. Mapleson's new prima donna in the two unique airs allotted to Astrifiammante, the "Queen of Night," than for any other purpose, and in one of the two, at any rate, they were rewarded for their pains. The reading of the slow introduction (G minor) to the first air left much to desire, as did the articulation of the rapid grupetti in the allegro molto, "Va! ritorla al rapitore;" but in the second, and far more taxing, "Gli angui d'inferno," although she could exhibit neither the precision of Anna Zerr, nor the fiery impulse of Ilma di Murska (being, in fact, wanting in dramatic power), Madame Gerster sang extremely well throughout, her execution of the staccato passages in the highest register of the voice being little short of marvellous. A storm of applause followed this remarkable display, and this so long continued that Madame Gerster was compelled to repeat the whole—which she did, with, if possible, increased effect. Madame Marie Rôze, an intelligent Pamina, gave the pathetic aria, "Ah! lo so," with sympathetic expression. Mdlle. Valleria, too, was a lively Papagena, matched with a genial Papageno, in Signor Del Puente, who is making rapid advance in the estimation of opera-goers. Not the least noticeable performance was the Sarastro of Signor Foli, whose deep bass voice is well suited to the music, and who sang each of his airs—"Possenti Numi" (with chorus), and "Qui sdegno"—with appropriate gravity of expression. Signor Carrion, as Tamino, and Signor Rinaldini, as Monostatos, were both acceptable. The orchestra was irreproachable, except in the overture, which was played so fast that Mozart himself would hardly have recognised it. In so elaborately constructed a contrapuntal piece as this overture clearness and accent are prime essentials; but taken at so rapid a pace neither one nor the other was practicable. After the opera came the National Anthem; and then the usual calls for principal singers, conductor, and manager. Remembering the circumstances against which he had to contend, it must be admitted that Mr. Mapleson has shown commendable energy. He has furnished a new theatre with every requisite in a very very brief space of time, and has brought out nineteen operas for which, a month before he opened, nothing whatever had been prepared. That he has been actively and zealously served by those about him is evident; otherwise his undertaking would have presented insurmountable obstacles. Notwithstanding the fact that, after the first three weeks, he lost the valuable aid of Mdlle. Titiens, he managed to pull through; and we have reason to believe that the first season of the new Majesty's Theatre has been at least, on the whole, a pecuniary success.

"Letters from Bayreuth."——Under the title of "Letters from Bayreuth," the well-known musical critic, Mr. Joseph Bennett, has republished, in a compact volume, a series of very interesting articles, originally addressed to the Daily Telegraph, on the performances of Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen, in August, 1876. A perusal of this little book, as unpretending as it is full of solid information, accompanied by searching and highly intelligent critical remarks on the subject treated, will amply repay the time spent upon it by an attentive reader, whether he be a proselyte to Wagner, or a disbeliever in Wagner's theories. Nothing could be clearer set forth, in that genuine Saxon English of which Mr. Joseph Bennett is unquestionably a master; and whether we may agree with all his conclusions, or the contrary, a consideration of his arguments, pro and con, will not be the less entertaining and instructive. What was said once upon a time, by an eminent critic, about the late Lord Lytton, to some friend who disputed that prolific author's claims to original genius, applies with equal truth to Mr. Joseph Bennett—"His diction, sir, alone is a charm." And to this may be added the subdued gravity of Mr. Bennett's style, his strong common sense, and the logical acuteness of his reasoning, from whatever point of view he may regard the topic he discusses. Apart from all this, however, the "Letters from Bayreuth" deserve to be universally read. They give us Wagner in a nutshell—that is, according to the impression created by the arch revolutionist upon the mind of the writer.

Waifs.——Madame Christine Nilsson has gone for a brief holiday to the banks of the Rhine, near the Drachenfels. She returns in the autumn to fulfil some engagements at Birmingham, Brighton, Manchester, &c.—M. Faure has rejoined his family at Etretât.—The next work to be produced at the Grand Opera in Paris is Halévy's Reine de Chypre, one of the longest and dreariest effusions of that never too lively composer. And Auber's Muette de Portici? And Auber's Gustave III.? Putting aside Guillaume Tell, Don Giovanni, and the Huguenots, M. Halanzier has not hitherto brought out an opera fit to hold a candle to either of them. Nevertheless, Auber is the greatest of French dramatic composers, and the French pride themselves on their "nationality," and especially in music.—The grand-niece of Cimarosa, who died recently in a hospital at Milan, was not the last to bear the name of that once renowned composer. Three grand-nephews of Cimarosa still survive—Aurelio and Ippolito, who reside at Naples, and Luigi, himself a composer, who has for a long time made Madrid his home.—M. Ambroise Thomas, composer of the Caid, Mignon, and Hamlet, has been appointed member of the Superior Commission of the "Expositions Internationales" in France.—Mr. Mapleson, we are informed, is about to give promenade concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre, with Mr. Weist Hill as conductor. Mr. Hill, who is not only an excellent violinist but a skilled and experienced orchestral chief, is the right man in the right place.—The paralytic stroke which lately seized the celebrated lyric comedian, Madame Marie Cabel, has not endangered her life; but from all reports we hear it has deprived her of the exquisite voice which enchanted so many in her time.—That universal favourite, Miss Minnie Hauck, is singing with her accustomed success at Baden-Baden.—The third volume of Mr. Alexander Thayer's invaluable "Life of Beethoven" is now in the press, at Berlin. It will be published both in German and in English.—The last news about Mdlle. Titiens is in some degree reassuring. She is still at Worthing, and has not only left her room, but taken air-exercise in a Bath chair. Her appearance at the forthcoming Gloucester Festival, however, is problematical at the best.—Mr. Frederic Archer has not resigned the post of organist at the Alexandra Palace, and the report circulated to the effect that the appointment will very shortly be vacant has no foundation in fact.—Some manuscript quartets for stringed instruments by the late Felicien David (composer of Le Desert) have recently been introduced to the Parisian public at a "seance musicale," given at the residence of M. Léon Godefroy, the pianist, one of David's most intimate friends. As they are highly spoken of, it is not unlikely that Mr. Arthur Chappell may introduce them at the Monday Popular Concerts.—M. Victor Massé's Paul et Virginie is to be produced shortly at Brussels. With M. Capoul (the original Paul) in the company, it was generally believed that the most popular of recent French operas would have formed one of the novel attractions at Mr. Gye's theatre.—The French Minister of Fine Arts has given the bronze for the statue to be erected in the course of September next, at Dijon.—Mdlle. Albani has left England for Spa, in Belgium, where she will remain until her services are required for the forthcoming Gloucester Festival.—Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg is engaged by Mr. Gye for two years more.

The Alleged Police Conspiracy.——Two whole days were last week devoted to the examination in chief of the convict William Kurr, upon whose testimony the charges against the Inspectors Druscovich, Meiklejohn, and Palmer, and the solicitor, Mr. Froggatt, appear mainly to rest. He detailed a number of transactions which he said had taken place between himself and them, alleging that he had paid Meiklejohn sums of 500*l.*, 200*l.*, and 100*l.* for services rendered to him, and that he had lent Druscovich 60*l.* and afterwards given him 25*l.* Another adjournment was ordered, and bail was again taken for Mr. Froggatt, but refused for the police-officers. An excited crowd collected about the Bow Street Police Court, and when Kurr was taken away he was heartily cheered, the detectives on the other hand being hissed and hooted. Mr. Froggatt was fortunate enough to escape recognition by the mob. At the commencement of the proceedings on Thursday last week Mr. Wontner complained of the false rumour that Inspector Druscovich had attempted to commit suicide. He characterised the statement as a gross libel both upon his client, who had a complete answer to the charge, and upon the prison authorities, whose arrangements were such as to make such an attempt impossible.

Amateur Highwaymen.——Two lads, aged respectively sixteen and thirteen, who seem to be ambitious of becoming knights of the road, last week ran away from their homes in London, and after providing themselves with pistols and ammunition made their way to Hounslow Heath, where one of them pointed his loaded weapon at another boy, and a policeman took them into custody. The boy who had been threatened with the pistol did not, however, appear to prosecute, and therefore the Brentford magistrates dismissed the charge, the chairman remarking that it was evident that they were playing at highwaymen.

Miscellaneous Items.——It is said that the law officers of the Crown have given it as their opinion that the recent affair between H.M.S. Shah and Amethyst and the Peruvian ironclad Huascar was justifiable, as the Huascar was to all intents and purposes acting as a pirate on the high seas.—Mr. Gladstone has taken legal proceedings against an Australian publishing firm for an infringement of the copyright of one of his pamphlets, and the case has been decided in his favour. It seems that while it is easy enough to protect the writings of English authors there exists no law to shield the Colonial writer from being pirated either there or in England, a condition of things which the Pall Mall Gazette characterises as "an Australian Atrocity."—One day last week a circular was issued from Scotland Yard announcing that a detective sergeant had absconded, and it was rumoured that he was in some way connected with the De Goncourt conspiracy. It seems, however, that he had only taken a holiday without leave, and gone home to his native country, Germany, from whence he wrote to say that his conduct was the result of "mental excitement." It is now stated that he is about to return to his post, but it is to be hoped that he will not be permitted to resume the delicate duties of a detective until he has quite recovered from his malady.—The Rev. S. Smith, rector of Landolph, is defendant in a libel suit in which one of his parishioners claims 2,000*l.* damages for having been falsely accused of forgery. The libel was published on a post-card, one of a series which the rev. defendant has been scattering broadcast, calling his parishioners hogs, perjurers, and applying other opprobrious epithets to them.—"Insufficiency of time" was the astounding plea put in in a recent breach of promise case, in which the parties had been courting for over thirty years. How much longer the defendant would have liked his fiancée to wait it is difficult to guess, and as he has actually married another lady, he himself can hardly be expected to know, unless indeed he contemplated either bigamy or murder. The jury very naturally looked upon the plea as insincere and valueless, and gave the lady 250*l.* damages.—A return has been issued of the expenditure in the Tichborne prosecution, which amounts to 60,074*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*, of which 23,676*l.* 17*s.* were counsels' fees; 18,712*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* was paid to witnesses, agents, &c.; 10,268*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* to law stationers and printers, 3,637*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* to short-hand writers, and 3,780*l.* to the jury.—The chairman of the Whitehaven town and harbour trustees has been fined 4*l.* for an assault upon a chimney sweep. It seems that the sweep was caught in the act of throwing soot into the harbour, and running away was pursued by the chairman, who struck him with a stick and finally felled him to the earth.—At the Leeds Assizes a medical student convicted of forging the name of a qualified practitioner to three certificates of death has been sentenced to twelve months' hard labour. Mr. Justice Manisty said that the full penalty for such a serious offence was penal servitude, and in any future case of the kind it would undoubtedly be inflicted.—A curious charge of attempting to extort money has been brought against two Greeks by a niece of Admiral Slade. The prosecutrix had been engaged to be married to one of the prisoners, and when the match was broken off, it was understood that her letters to him had been destroyed. Subsequently, however, the discarded lover said that he had kept them, and that the box containing them had been seized by one of his creditors, who demanded 695*l.* for their restoration. The accused were both committed for trial, the magistrate remarking that it was one of the most wicked cases he had ever heard of, and that no power on earth would induce him to take bail for such men as the prisoners.—The charge of fraud upon the Artisans' Dwelling Company was again before the magistrate at Bow Street on Wednesday, and another adjournment was ordered, Mr. Vaughan intimating his intention of committing all the defendants for trial.—At the Leeds Assizes a lad aged eleven has been convicted of the manslaughter of a child two years and a half old, whose dead body was found in a wood where the two had been seen together. He has been sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment, and five years in a Reformatory—Two executions for wife murder took place on Tuesday, the one at Leicester and the other at Stafford. The culprit at the first named place on being taken to the condemned cell complained that his sentence was not being carried out, as the judge had ordered him to be "taken to the place from whence he came."—A soldier belonging to the 4th Regiment of Dragoons, stationed at Dundalk, has been murdered, and a Militiaman named Buckley has been arrested on suspicion of being the assassin. On Tuesday some comrades of the deceased escaped from barracks, and scoured the streets in a state of great excitement, the constabulary being quite unable to keep them in CATTLE PLAGUE COMPENSATION.——The sum of 4*l.* per head is the maximum that is recommended by the Cattle Plague Committee to be given as compensation to the owners of cattle that are slaughtered by direction of Government authorities.

THE CAXTON CELEBRATION.——An interesting volume, containing four fac-similes of examples from William Caxton's press at Westminster, has been published by Mr. F. C. Price, fac-similist to the British Museum. The impression is privately printed for subscribers only, and is limited to 125 copies. The fac-similes are prefixed by a memoir of Caxton, and are accompanied by a copy of the drawing in the MS. of the Dictes and Sayengis in the Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth, with reasons for considering the "figure in black" an authentic portrait of Caxton.

AN INGENIOUS SAFEGUARD AGAINST BURGLARS has been adopted in New York. The door of a house is fitted with a contrivance, which, immediately on the lock being tampered with, gives a signal at the neighbouring police-station. The thieves are quite unaware of the trick, and are thus speedily caught in the act. An equally ingenious apparatus is used in some warehouses as a fire-alarm. A small thermometer is hung in the warehouse, and should a fire occur, the material in the thermometer rises, rings a bell at the fire-station, and gives the alarm.

THE COLORADO BEETLE.——We have received from Messrs. Stollwerck Brothers, of Cologne, a little box containing life-size wax models of the insect in all stages of its existence, from the egg to the fully developed beetle. They are excellent imitations, and are certainly well calculated to impress the dullest of minds with a correct notion of this dangerous pest. The models are formed after living specimens found at Mulheim, and they have been ordered in large quantities by the German, Saxon, and Austrian Governments for distribution throughout those countries to agriculturists, farmers, schools, custom house officers, &c. The Agricultural Department of our own Privy Council Office have also expressed their approbation of Messrs. Stollwerck's models, which we certainly warmly recommend to the notice of farmers and all interested in agricultural pursuits.

DRAWINGS BY THE ITALIAN MASTERS:

REPRODUCED BY THE

AUTOTYPE PROCESS

FROM THE

ORIGINALS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine taste. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. Of the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE IMPERIAL MEETING AT ISCHL.——The conference of the two Emperors on Wednesday has caused considerable uneasiness throughout Europe. It is almost certain that the Czar has asked the Austrian Emperor to allow his troops to march through Servia; and the general belief is that this request formed the subject of conversation between the two Sovereigns. If left to his own devices, the Emperor Francis Joseph would probably at once decline to sanction the step proposed by his Russian ally, for the throwing open of the Morava valley would be of enormous advantage to the Russians, and Austria does not want to see Turkey utterly crushed. But Germany is undoubtedly supporting Russia as heartily as she can without actually intervening. In the first place, she is very glad to see a Power she dislikes weakened by a disastrous struggle; and, in the second, she wishes to make the most of the present opportunity of detaching Russia from France. If the Russians can be persuaded that they owe an immense debt of gratitude to Germany, it is at least possible that all talk of an alliance with France may in future be given up. We may, then, feel tolerably certain that the Austrian Emperor was earnestly urged on Wednesday not to stand in the way of the success of Russia. He would be reminded of the duties imposed by the Triple Alliance, of the monstrous wickedness of the Turks, of the noble Christian mission of the Czar. If the Austrian Emperor has allowed himself to be convinced, the day will be an evil one for Turkey; but it will perhaps be hardly less evil for Austria herself. In the event of the Ottoman Empire being broken up, she would of course be allowed to take the neighbouring Turkish provinces; but this would be poor compensation for the immense increase of power Russia would secure. At present the Panslavonic movement does not seriously endanger the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, but if the authority of the Czar extended beyond the Balkans the agitation would instantly become a tremendous peril.

THE BANK HOLIDAY.——This is a trite topic, but the contemplation of a vast City giving itself up to a deliberate day's holiday is one of very great interest. Volumes might be written on the various aspects of the holiday makers, as indeed volumes have been written in the pages of our current literature. But there is a large class of Bank Holiday makers which we do not remember to have had justice done to it. It is an undemonstrative class, though it numbers its thousands and tens of thousands. We mean those who seek their day's pleasure in simply strolling about the streets without any definite aim or object. We do not, however, mean the idle loafing vagabonds whose whole idea of a day's holiday seems to be migrating from one public-house to another, and gradually befuddling themselves till they become noisy, quarrelsome, or melancholy drunk; but the families which sally forth in a body to keep holiday in one another's company. They are generally of the humbler artisan class. There is pater and mater-familias, and the master and misses-familiases—a happy group which can make a satisfactory day's holiday in the mere perambulation of the thoroughfares—spectatum veniunt, if not exactly veniunt spectentur ut ipsi. "Baby" is always one of the party, and papa and mamma (for there are no "fathers" and "mothers" in this enlightened era) carry it, as we must term the unwalking one, by turns. They drop in from time to time at a house of refreshment for a modest pint of "four-'arf," papa indulges in a limited succession of "penny smokes," and the children of all ages and sexes in sweets and halfpenny ices. And who shall say them nay? They spend their holiday most reasonably and at a moderate cost, if shoe leather be not taken into consideration, showing a favourable comparison with the heartless "heads of houses" who leave "missis and the kids" at home, and "besotted in sweet self," as our Laureate has it, take their holiday with their fellows of the same kidney, and that not seldom most disreputably. What a happy thing it would be if an Act of Parliament could discriminate between those worthy and those unworthy of a Bank Holiday! We should like to give the humble family groups to which we have alluded a holiday at least once a month.

THE WAR.——The Turks have succeeded in surprising both friends and foes. Before the war broke out all the world was of opinion that in a few weeks the Russians would be at Adrianople, or even at Constantinople. But at all points they have hitherto utterly failed. In Asia they appear to be resuming the struggle, but only timidly and tentatively, for they were so decisively driven back that they have hardly been able as yet to reorganise themselves and pluck up fresh courage. It was natural, after the reverses in Asia, that the Czar should wish their effect to be broken by some brilliant feat south of the Balkans. But he has now good reason to regret that he did not set about his self-imposed task with more calmness and patience. The Battle of Plevna has caused him far more serious inconvenience than it was generally supposed the Turks were in a position to inflict. In proportion to the confidence with which the Russians entered upon the engagement has been their sense of humiliation and disgust since defeat. Many rumours daily come from the seat of war as to the point or points at which they are concentrating their forces, but it is difficult to make out the truth amid a crowd of conflicting statements. What is certain is that the rank and file have been much disconcerted by their unexpected misfortunes, and that the Commander-in-Chief, who is by no means a military genius, feels that his next important step must be taken with the utmost caution. The truth is that Russia cannot afford to sustain many such defeats. The revolutionary forces at home are moving ominously, and if the army were seized by a real panic, the Czar would have good cause to tremble for more than his crown. In the mean time Osman Pasha, who has been blamed for not vigorously following up his victory, awaits behind his entrenchments the attack which is sure to come; and Mehemet Ali also deems it safer to stand prepared in the strong positions about Rasgrad which he at present occupies. Suleiman Pasha is doing his utmost to give a good account of Gourko, and it is not impossible he may succeed. In that case Russia will have to do almost all her work over again, and will eagerly anticipate the decision of Austria as to the part Servia, and perhaps Roumania, are to play during the remainder of the campaign.

HOSPITAL SUNDAY.——Without going into the figures disclosed by the recent report of the Hospital Sunday Fund, and at the same time without the slightest wish to throw cold water upon an excellent institution, there is no getting away from the fact that "Hospital Sunday" in the metropolis is by no means a success. After some years of trial, and the hard labour of many philanthropic persons to extend and thoroughly establish the scheme, what is 25,000*l.* (speaking in round numbers) to collect over the large metropolitan area appealed to on "Hospital Sunday?" Compared with the seven, eight, and more thousands collected in Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and the Irish and Scotch capitals, what is the sum just named when the wealth and population of the metropolis are taken into consideration? There are several causes in operation which deny to "Hospital Sunday" in the metropolis the success which has attended it elsewhere. To start with, the clergy of the Church do not seem to have taken up the matter very warmly, owing partly to the fact that they are annually committed to so many other calls on their congregations. Then, again, a large number of persons who are annual subscribers to the London hospitals decline to contribute to the Hospital Sunday Fund, and doubtless not a few decline on the general grounds that our medical charities are much abused. But these are minor causes compared with the absence of that interest which is felt in "Hospital Sunday" in the provincial centres of population. There is no civic unity in the metropolis such as that which exists in Birmingham, Manchester, and other places. Hardly any one in London cares for the parish or district in which he resides. In fact, there is no local patriotism. In the towns and cities above mentioned there is much local pride and interest in local institutions, and so it comes to pass that each town likes to make a good show on its "Hospital Sunday." And even further than this, in the provinces there is a rivalry among the different religious communities and congregations, whereas there seems to be no such rivalry in the metropolis. Judging from the experience of the last few years, it can hardly be expected that Hospital Sunday in London will ever produce as much as 30,000*l.*, and even if this were attained it would be but a trifling sum when apportioned among the many institutions which have a claim on it.

THE IRISH MEMBERS.——The Home Rule party is in serious difficulty. Mr. Parnell and his friends still claim to represent the Irish people; but Mr. Butt will not allow that they represent more than an unimportant faction. At the meeting on Monday it was impossible to arrive at a decision, so vehement was the tone of the various speakers. For a day or two afterwards there was a rumour that Mr. Butt intended to resign his seat and claim re-election. This would have been the most direct way of solving the problem, for if he had failed it would have been manifest that the Obstructionists had more support than had been generally believed. Had he succeeded they would have been deprived of any little influence they may now exert. We can scarcely doubt what are the feelings of the mass of the Irish people on the subject. Ireland wishes independence, but she cannot desire to obtain it by means that make her an object of contempt throughout Europe. Mr. Parnell persistently maintains that his sole motive has been to assert the right of Irish members to take part in Imperial legislation. But how is it possible to reconcile this with his boasts of "retaliation?" And even if he is sincere, how wild and senseless is his mode of making Irish power felt! We think too highly of the intellect and self-respect of Irishmen to suppose for a moment that they can cordially approve his tactics. He, Mr. O'Donnell, and the rest of the small band will doubtless stump their country during the recess. It is to be hoped they will meet with a reception that will be even more effectual than Sir Stafford Northcote's mild threats in cooling their foolish fervour.

THE POLICE.——"Where are the police?" or, rather, "How are they?" Evidently not in high favour just now. From what has transpired recently both in and out of Parliament, it may be taken for granted that there will before long be issued a Royal Commission, or something of the kind, to inquire into the state of the Metropolitan guardians of the peace of all grades. There is a very prevalent impression that there is something "rotten in the state of Denmark." Gigantic frauds and robberies of all kinds have been perpetrated one after another of late years, and the detective police seem to have been almost powerless to find a clue to them; while the rank and file of the force have in numberless instances covered themselves with disgrace. Hence a very widely-spread feeling of disquietude and distrust of our police administration generally. The conviction is being forced upon us that we have not the right sort of men for the work in their several grades. What then is to be done? The answer which at once suggests itself is that we should get a different class, a higher type and tone of men. But this is a matter of money - and what will the ratepayers say to this aspect of the question? They must, however, face it, if they demand a higher moral standard in the Force. The police should be so paid that they would be above pecuniary temptation, at least comparatively speaking. The public is probably but little aware of the number of cases which are "squared" in the course of the year. If this system is to be stopped we must have men who are not likely to be "squared"—and, humanly speaking, there is only one way of getting them.

ENGLAND AND THE TRANSVAAL.——The debate on the Transvaal on Tuesday did a great deal of good, for it finally dissipated some extremely mischievous notions as to the object of the annexation. A vague idea seems to have prevailed that we took the country merely because it was in a state of disorder. This would have been obviously unjust; and Mr. Lowther not only admitted the fact but asserted in the strongest possible terms that our sole purpose was the defence of our own rights. The Government of the Transvaal has persistently ill-treated the natives. It has often, as Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen pointed out, been shamefully cruel to them; and it has always been more or less encroaching on their lands. In these circumstances the surrounding tribes very naturally detested the Boers; and it is certain that had we not intervened they would again and again have renewed their attacks on their oppressors. The Boers not only provoked their enmity, but were unable to meet them on the field. The Blue Books show clearly that the Republic has long been in a condition of anarchy, utterly unable to offer real resistance to determined enemies. The result is that the British colonies have been haunted by a dread of native violence, and trade and industry have had to contend with formidable obstacles. There was no alternative but to annex the country; and the advantage of the step is seen in the comparative quiet which has been already established. The Boers themselves seem to have had no particular objection to being taken under British rule; and by-and-by they will probably look upon Sir Theophilus Shepstone as the greatest benefactor they have ever had. We may hope, therefore, that even Mr. Courtney will henceforth cease to deliver violent speeches on a subject on which he is quite out of sympathy with the nation.

HIPPOPHAGY.——It is evident that the consumption of horseflesh, including that of mules and donkeys, is making definite progress in Paris. In the year 1867, the number of horses converted into food in the French capital did not reach 2,000, but within three years it had about doubled. The siege of Paris, which caused many to "make a virtue of necessity" in a variety of ways, has had some influence on the taste of our trans-Channel friends. Last year about 9,000 horses found their way to the butchers' shops; and this year a further increased consumption is shown from the returns of the first six months, which record a total of 5,283 horses, mules, and donkeys converted into joints. Thus it may be said that hippophagy has fairly established itself among the French, for many of the provincial towns and cities show a somewhat corresponding extension of the practice. Germany, Belgium, and Switzerland are also advancing in the same direction. It is "John Bull," who more than all the representatives of the human race sets his face and palate resolutely against hippophagy. He can hardly be induced to look at, much less taste, horseflesh, to say nothing of donkeys and mules. Since the great "hippic" banquet some years ago at the Langham Hotel, when the horse was served in a score or more different forms, and served well, too, it is a question whether a score of converts have been made to horseflesh as an article of food in this country; and in vain did M. Decroixe, at a grand hippophagistic banquet held at the Grand Hotel in Paris three years ago, offer 1,000 francs and a gold medal to any butcher who would open and keep open a shop in London for the sale of horseflesh for a period of three months. We can no more eat our horses than our dogs or the "harmless necessary cat." And yet, prejudice apart, there is no valid objection to be maintained against the flesh of horses. Chemically it contains a larger proportion of nitrogenous material than even a well-fed ox; and it is as easily digested as ordinary beef and mutton, and more so than veal or pork. Perhaps as a "horsey" nation we shrink from converting the "noble animal" we love so well (and often torture so cruelly) into food; and perhaps, too, there is something more than a lurking suspicion that the flesh of a horse is unwholesome on the ground that it is scheduled in the Levitical Law as one of the animals which do not "divide the hoof." We are not, however, about to take upon ourselves the advocacy of horseflesh, if for no other reason, for this—viz., that our advocacy would not be likely to produce any result. Still the question is one which the public should not lose sight of. Old horses might be fattened—say for some three or four months—before they pass into the hands of the butcher, and thus their flesh, which has become tough from years of hard work, would be brought to a more tender state. Moreover, old servants who have done well their work in life would enjoy a happy retirement from business, and be spared the cruel demand on their exhausted powers to the bitter end.

THE WAR IN THE EAST

BASHI-BAZOUKS AT BAY

WHATEVER may be the faults and failings of these barbarous irregulars, who in many cases volunteer their services solely for the sake of the plunder which warfare enables them to commit with impunity, there is no doubt that they fight bravely when brought face to face with the enemy, although they generally avoid risking any such contest by the swiftness of their horses and the watchful care with which they keep on the outskirts of the hostile army. When really "at bay," however, they fight like wild animals, and, possessing all the ferocity of Turcos or Malays, neither give nor expect quarter. A correspondent of Tuesday's Times describes a characteristic incident in which a wounded Mussulman, whose agonies the Russians were trying to assuage, managed to raise himself to a sitting posture, and fired at and wounded an officer, for which he was speedily transfixed by the Cossacks, the same expression of perfect rage and hatred remaining on his face even after death.

"ATROCITIES"

THESE sketches, received from two separate correspondents, are powerfully illustrative of the horrors of the present war, and of the outrages and cruelties which are perpetrated by the irregular troops of both armies. These incidents have been graphically described by the correspondents of various journals, and notably in the columns of The Times, and as on a former occasion, we feel it our duty not to shrink from representing such incidents on account of their painful character. The mission of a correspondent is to depict what actually takes place, and not merely to confine his sketches to rose-coloured representations of the events of the campaign. The sketches by our correspondent at Rasgrad portray some of the survivors of the Mussulman peasants who were murdered by the Bulgarians and Cossacks when attempting to fly from the village of Sinan Keui. They may be regarded as absolutely authentic, having been taken from life by our artist himself. In The Times of Saturday a correspondent gives an account of these poor creatures, who, numbering seventeen, were the only survivors of the Turkish fugitives, who were hurrying to Rustchuk for safety from the invader. Their train numbered forty waggons, and was speedily overtaken by the hostile horsemen, who at once began the inhuman slaughter, thirty-five people being killed on the spot, numbers of women being carried off by the Cossacks as spoil, and the remainder escaping with very little remnant of life. Of these the correspondent and our artist found seventeen in the hospital at Rasgrad, four being mere children and one being a very old man. The wounds of these poor creatures, as may be seen from the description under the illustration, were from blows, lance thrusts, sabre cuts, and firearms, the total number of wounds on the seventeen victims being thirty-six.

Our other two sketches were taken during the visit of the correspondent of The Times to Yeni Sagra. It appears that, instigated by the news of the Russian advance, the Bulgarians set fire to the Turkish quarter. The Russians however, were, unable to take the town, and the Bashi-Bazouks accordingly inflicted terrible reprisals upon the unfortunate Christians, completely sacking the town and committing the most atrocious outrages. Guided by two Bulgarians The Times correspondent, wishing to obtain an insight into the truth of the matter, visited some houses in the outskirts, and soon saw sufficient to convince himself that the reports of the excesses were very little exaggerated. The first place visited was a house in the environs, once the property of a certain Moudin, whose wife had been murdered by Bashi-Bazouks. After a short search the body of the woman was found, and then the workmen came upon the remains of a man in "rough Bulgarian clothes, with a terrific sabre cut across his face and neck, and an indication of a bullet on his forehead—being apparently about 30 years of age." This discovery is portrayed in our illustration, and we need not proceed further with the details of these terrible horrors which as this letter and our sketches plainly evince, are not wholly the invention of the atrocity-mongers.

PHOTOGRAPHY IN WAR

THESE four engravings are from photographs taken during the campaign, and are interesting from the fact that this is the first time that photography has been in any noteworthy degree utilised to illustrate the events of a campaign. The subjects need little description. Two represent views of the bridge which was constructed by the Russians between Simnitza and Sistova after they had succeeded in crossing the Danube and securing the latter town. We gave an account of the manner in which the bridge was constructed at the time. "Sisters of Charity from St. Petersburg" are some of those patriotic and courageous women who, after a brief education in nursing and medicine at the Russian capital, flock to the theatre of war to succour the sick and wounded. The last illustration depicts a group of the first Russian officers and soldiers who set their foot on Turkish soil during the recent crossing of the Danube, and who have all accordingly been decorated for their ardour in an expedition which at the time was looked upon as a most dangerous undertaking. As it was, the first soldiers to land had to do so under a most withering fire from the Turks.

A SKIRMISH AT HAIDAR-KEUI

Our double-page engraving represents one of the frequent skirmishes which are constantly taking place between the irregular troops of both the Russian and Turkish armies, the actual scene represented having been sketched near the village of Haidar Keui (Bulgaria) on July 16th. The troops engaged were Cossacks and Circassians and Bashi-Bazouks, and the affair, though simply a skirmish, may serve to show the type of character of these irregulars who have obtained so great a notoriety during the past three months. Of the Bashi-Bazouk and Circassian we have already frequently spoken, but the following details of the various bodies of Cossacks employed in the Russian army may prove of interest at the present time:—

The Cossacks are of various tribes and (except those of the Don) being exempt from the law of universal service, cannot all be sent away from their homes even in time of war. They may be divided into several classes, the Cossacks of the Don, who alone are liable to general service everywhere, the Kuban Cossacks, the Cossacks of the Terek, the Astrakan Cossacks, the Orenberg Cossacks, the Cossacks of the Ural, and of Siberia, the Siemiryechensk and Transbaikal Cossacks and Cossacks of the Amur. The three first divisions and those of the Ural furnish detachments for the Imperial Guard, and have a certain proportion always ready for service in time of peace: the rest are only available in war, and then only for local and frontier defence. The most important body also are the Don Cossacks, regiments of whom in addition to the Guard regiments have now been distributed amongst the various army corps. Their dress is a tunic, loose shaggy trousers, a cloak, and a sheepskin cap. Other Cossacks have fur caps. The arms of the Don Cossacks and several other tribes consist of pikes, Circassian swords, and rifled carbines. Curiously enough only the Cossacks of the Guards wear spurs, perhaps because most of the tribes would find it difficult to use them, as they have a peculiar seat on horseback, with their legs tucked up very high. The artillery (Cossacks possess their own) wear the same dress as the cavalry, and are armed with the Circassian sword and pistol, the swords being worn in the belt. The horse equipment consist of blanket, wooden saddle-tree, horse rug (chabraque), two leathern wallets, and a forage rope. The Ural Cossacks of the Guard, however, indulge in the luxury of a valise. The usual regimental train of most nations is represented among the Cossacks by only one waggon per regiment, but a pack animal is allowed for every ten men in war, and we are much mistaken if it is not sometimes pretty well laden with booty.—Indeed in 1812-14 the Cossacks formed a chain of posts from the Seine to the Don, so as to systematically carry off works of art and other booty from Paris. The number of effective Cossacks of the Don—who, as we have said, are the most important, is roughly estimated at 75,000. The total number of Cossacks, according to the new military law, would amount to 180,000.

COSSACKS CUTTING THE TELEGRAPH

AMONGST other useful services which the Cossacks perform for the main army is destroying the telegraphic communication between two important centres of the enemy, and in our sketch they are represented cutting the lines between Rustchuck and the headquarters of the Turkish army at Shumla.

THE GRAND DUKE'S BODY-GUARD ENTERING TIRNOVA

WE have already given an account of the entry of the Russian forces into the capital of Bulgaria, and here we have the arrival of the Grand Duke's guard of Circassians, who are accompanying their master. A special ovation was accorded by the inhabitants of Tirnova to the Grand Duke and his Staff, triumphal arches being erected, and the troops being fairly pelted with flowers from the hands of enthusiastic damsels.

WITH THE TURKS AT SHUMLA

THE replacement of poor bed-ridden, apathetic Abd-ul-Kerim Pasha by Mehemet Ali Pasha as Commander-in-Chief of the Turkish forces was joyfully received by both officers and soldiers, who had watched the long period of inaction with intense impatience and anxiety. Nor were their hopes excited by the change disappointed, as Mehemet Ali is a German by birth, having arrived at Constantinople in a merchant vessel in his youth, subsequently entering the Turkish service. On the day following his arrival he held a grand review, and then at once began work by ordering an advance forward, and commencing that movement which threatens to cut off the Russian communications south of Tirnova.

WITH THE TURKS—CAVALRY CAMP NEAR SHUMLA—"AN ALARM"

THIS sketch needs little explanation—a detachment of Turkish cavalry from Shumla have encamped for the night near that fortress, but aroused by the report of "Muscov!" "Muscov!" "Russ!" "Russ!" from their patrol, are rapidly striking their tents, and are hurrying to boot and saddle, and reconnoitre with all possible speed.

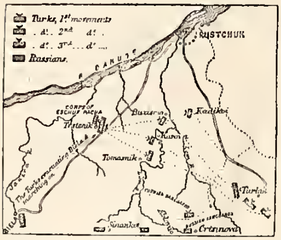
SULINA, WITH THE HOUSES OF THE DANUBE COMMISSION

We have already illustrated and described the Sulina mouth of the Danube with the Turkish fleet at anchor, and the present sketch will give the reader a somewhat different view of this important outlet. Here may be seen the houses and offices of the Danube Commission—that body with whom the Russians are so angry because it has not forbidden Turkish men-of-war to ascend the stream, and upon whom they have retaliated by sinking old ships laden with stones to obstruct the entrance.

THE RECENT RUSSIAN ADVANCE UPON RUSTCHUCK

The annexed plan portrays the manner in which, after crossing the Danube, the Russians, under the Czarevitch, gradually forced back the Turks from Biela, and invested Rustchuck, cutting off communication between that fortress and the Turkish headquarters at Shumla, and at the same time attempting to effect a junction with General Zimmerman and his 40,000 men in the Dobrudscha. The diagrams explain themselves, and we need only mention that owing to the defeat at Plevna, the Czarevitch has been unable to join General Zimmermann, and has withdrawn the troops from around Rustchuck in order to reinforce the main army.



"UNEASY LIES THE HEAD THAT WEARS A CROWN"

The scene here depicted is sufficiently suggestive, even without the significant title bestowed upon it by the artist. Our imagination at once travels back to the Middle Ages, before "Constitutional" Government was invented, and when Ballot Boxes, Party Politics, Election Riots, and Parliamentary Obstructives, were still in the dark womb of futurity. The features of the King, who is represented pushing aside the heavy curtain as he enters the apartment, appears to be so worn with anxiety that the presence of his four-footed body-guard is scarcely needed to tell us that his life is in constant danger. His mien is scarcely that of a tyrant against whom some long-suffering thrall has at last risen in revolt, and yet how otherwise are we account for his insecurity? That threatening parchment pinned with a poignard to the floor may have been placed there by some reckless and revengeful malefactor, whose misdeeds have caused him to be sternly rebuked or justly punished by his liege; or perchance by some impatient aspirant to the throne. Whatever be the explanation of the mystery, we cannot well withhold sympathy from the weary careworn monarch whose gleaming eyes are fixed upon the dreadful document before him; and we turn away with a feeling of thankfulness that we live in less troublous times, and that all men are not called upon to assume the dignities and dangers of Majesty.—Our engraving is from the picture by J. C. Dollman, which was this year exhibited at the Royal Academy.

THE LATE SAMUEL WARREN, Q.C.

Mr. Samuel Warren, who died on Sunday the 29th ult. was the eldest son of the late Dr. Warren. He was born in 1807, was educated at Edinburgh University, and after studying medicine for some time, changed his views, and became a law student at the Inner Temple, and was called to the Bar in 1837. Mr. Warren was well known to novel readers by his "Diary of a Late Physician," a series of sketches contributed to "Blackwood," and still better by his celebrated work, "Ten Thousand a Year," which was published in 1841, and was followed in 1847 by another novel, "Now and Then." A rhapsody composed upon the opening of the Exhibition of 1851, under the title of "The Lily and the Bee," was by no means favourably received, and was his last considerable effort as a writer of works of imagination. His "Introduction to Law Studies" is still occasionally consulted by students, but it insists on a wide range of study, which few, it may be feared, ever dream of compassing. This work was written while the author was still a student. Afterwards Mr. Warren wrote several legal treatises. He became a Queen's Counsel in 1851, and in the following year was appointed Recorder of Hull. He represented Midhurst in Parliament in the Conservative interest from 1856 to 1859, when he was appointed by Lord Chelmsford a Master in Lunacy, a position he held till his death.—Our portrait is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company, 108, Regent Street.

THE GRIMSBY ELECTION

Mr. Alfred Mellor Watkin, the new member for Grimsby in place of the late Mr. John Chapman, is the son of Sir E. W. Watkin, M.P. The constituency numbers about 6,000, and although no more than about half the electors took the trouble to record their votes, the proceedings appear to have been conducted with more than usual liveliness. There were three candidates, Mr. Watkin, Major Seddon, and Dr. Sayle, who polled respectively 1,699, 1,315, and 97. A little before the closing of the poll, the doors at one of the polling stations were closed against some voters, who immediately burst them open. This incident created some excitement which, however, soon subsided, but after the declaration of the poll an attack was made upon the Royal Hotel where Mr. Watkin was staying. The roughs smashed the windows with stones, and lumps of coal from the adjacent railway, broke open the refreshment rooms, and after helping themselves freely to liquor, threatened to burn down the house. The riot began about 8 P.M., and at 1 A.M. on the Thursday the Mayor read the Riot Act, and the police, armed with cutlasses and assisted by a number of townsmen, charged the crowd and dispersed it. The military, which had been telegraphed for from Sheffield, arrived about 6 A.M. by special train, but by that time all was quiet. A number of the ringleaders have been apprehended, and are now under remand. It is said that the original cause of discontent was the alleged corrupt conduct of the Liberals, and the striking of 600 persons off the register; and that the crowd was further provoked by speeches from the balcony of the hotel, in which they were denounced as "drunken ruffians," "sneaking cowards," and "cowardly beggars." This, however, has been positively denied by Sir E. Watkin.—Our portrait of Mr. Watkin is from a photograph by F. E. Friston, Market Place, Great Grimsby.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——On Monday about 1,600 members of the Westminster Working Men's Constitutional Association visited Hatfield Park, where they dined, and were addressed by Lord Salisbury and Viscount Sandon, the former expressing a hope that the Government would be able to conduct the country through all the difficulties of the present crisis, without trenching in the faintest degree either upon its interests or its honour, and without losing for a single moment the priceless blessings of peace.—Several other Conservative fêtes have been held this week. There was one at Canford Park, near Wimborne, on Monday, and another at Birmingham, where Mr. J. Hubbard, M.P., was the chief speaker.—If the Australian papers are to be believed, Sir C. Gavan Duffy has made a strange mistake as to the views of Mr. Bright on the subject of free trade. In a recent speech he appears to have claimed not only Mr. Bright, but Thomas Carlyle and the late J. S. Mill as Protectionists; and Mr. Bright has written a letter to set his memory right so far as he himself is concerned.—Mr. W. H. Smith has been appointed First Lord of the Admiralty in succession to the late Mr. Ward Hunt, and has already issued an address to his constituents, asking them to re-elect him.—For Northamptonshire the candidates are Lord Burleigh, "a Conservative by conviction as well as by birth," and Captain Wyatt-Edgell, of Stanford Hall, who appeals to the Liberals.—For South Shropshire the only candidate yet announced is Sir Baldwyn Leighton (C); and for the county of Clare four candidates have been nominated—viz., Mr. F. N. V. Burton, The O'Gorman, Sir Bryan O'Loghlen (Home Rulers), and Mr. R. W. C. Reeves (C).—The conduct of the Obstructionists in Parliament last week was discussed at a meeting of Home Rulers in London on Monday, but no decision was arrived at. The rumour that Mr. Butt intended to apply for the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, in order that he might at once test the feelings of his constituents as to his fitness for the leadership of the Irish party, has been authoritatively contradicted.

The Congress Season has fairly commenced, several being now in full swing in addition to those noticed in our "Church News." That of the Royal Archæological Society began on Tuesday at Hereford, under the presidency of the Bishop. The proceedings included a lecture by Sir Gilbert Scott, on the Cathedral, and a reception at the Episcopal Palace.—The Cambrian Archæological Association also opened its annual session on Tuesday, at Carnarvon, Lord C. Paget taking the chair, and Professor Babbington delivering the inaugural address. The Bishop of St. Asaph is the president for the ensuing year.—On the same day at Manchester the members of the British Medical Association commenced their forty-fifth annual meeting, Dr. Eason Wilkinson presiding. The proceedings commenced with an inaugural sermon by the Bishop upon the immortality of the soul, the preacher remarking that it was surprising how little modern science had done to undermine the old foundations upon which all religions, and Christianity as the highest form of religion, most ultimately repose. Dr. Bartolome, the retiring president, delivered an address.—On Wednesday a number of medals and illuminated addresses were presented to the surgeons who were professionally engaged in the recent colliery at Pontypridd. Mr. H. A. Davies received a gold medal, whilst his assistants were awarded medals of silver and bronze.—Finally we have to note the meetings of the High Court of Foresters at Greenwich, under the presidency of the Chief Ranger of the Order, and of the Odd Fellows' Annual Legislative Council at Rotheram.

The Tynewydd Colliery Disaster.——Saturday was a grand day for the brave colliers of the Rhondda Valley. Some 30,000 or 40,000 persons assembled on the summit of a mountain near Pontypridd, where the medals and prizes were given away. The rescued men and their rescuers appeared in their mining dress, and carried lighted Davy lamps, picks, and other tools. Mr. Talbot, M.P., Lord Lieutenant of the County, presided, and after welcoming the Lord Mayor of London, presented the cups given out of the Daily Telegraph Fund, to those engineers who declined to receive money. Major Duncan, R.A., then dealt out the St. John of Jerusalem medals, and Mr. Hussey Vivian, M.P., distributed the watches subscribed for by the House of Commons. The Lord Mayor next presented the awards from the Mansion House Fund, the widows coming first, then the rescued men, and the boy Hughes, afterwards the rescuing party, and finally the engineers, surgeons, and lady nurses, which latter were each saluted by the Lord Mayor with a kiss. The last feature of the day's proceedings was the presentation of the Albert Medals by Lord Aberdare, on behalf of the Queen. His lordship made a long speech, in which he said he felt deeply honoured at being the medium of presenting those brave men with the honour which Her Majesty had created especially for them.—Mr. James Thomas, the proprietor of the colliery, has been charged with manslaughter, it being alleged that the accident was the result of culpable negligence. The trial took place on Monday and Tuesday at Swansea, before Baron Cleasby, and resulted in the dismissal of the jury, who, after being locked-up for two hours, were unable to agree. Mr. Thomas was liberated on his own recognisances.

The Bank Holiday was very generally observed both in London and the provinces, and the weather being extremely fine the pleasure seekers passed a happy time, and the railway and steamboat companies and owners of other means of locomotion reaped a rich harvest. The Palaces at Sydenham and Muswell Hill were largely patronised, the chief attractions at the one being the conjuring of Herr Frikell, and some daring acrobatic feats; and at the other a "Popular Concert," and a pyrotechnic display upon the lake in imitation of the "Crossing of the Danube." The Tower, the Museums, and the theatres had their full complement of visitors, and the excursionists to Hampstead, Epping Forest, Kew, Hampton, Greenwich, and other suburban resorts were simply innumerable. At Birmingham a large number of holiday-folk were hoaxed into a fruitless journey of some miles by a fictitious announcement of some races at Bordesley Green. A fatal accident occurred on Lake Windermere, where a boat containing half-a-dozen excursionists from Huddersfield was upset and four persons were drowned. There was a similar disaster on the Thames, near Twickenham, which resulted in the drowning of a boy of fourteen, his three companions escaping.

Gladstoniana.——The ex-Premier has been displaying his prowess as a woodman in the presence of 1,400 members of the Bolton Liberal Association, who on Saturday last visited him at Hawarden. At first the ex-Premier fought shy of his guests, and refused to have anything to say to them; but after much pressing he and his son went out, armed with axes, and set to work upon a hugh ash tree, while the delighted spectators sang glees and pocketed the chips to carry home as souvenirs. Presently the illustrious woodman paused to rest, and, leaning on his axe, discoursed about the advantages of pure air and water of the country and the impure ditto of town. His audience tried hard to get "just a little bit" from him about "the Eastern Question," but he firmly refused to say one word about politics or party matters. Mr. W. H. Gladstone, however, made a supplementary speech, in which he said that although his father had remained silent on those subjects, "his time might come again."

PARLIAMENT

Within the last week legislation in both Houses of Parliament has been advancing by leaps and bounds. Perhaps a more homely and less historical phrase would better describe the method of progress in the House of Lords. It might be said of business in the Gilded Chamber that the progress has been made in a hop-skip-step-and-jump fashion. Unless the question be one which involves some valuable square yards of the Marquis of Salisbury's town property the House of Lords is content to receive Bills from the Commons, and pass them without comment. Thus on Tuesday night the Scotch and Irish Prisons Bills, which have occupied hon. members in the other House for many days, were advanced through important stages in just so many minutes as it took the Clerk at the table to read out their titles. After which their lordships, numbering on busy days as many as a dozen, have peacefully gone home.

In the Commons the business has been dealt with in the same determined fashion, but with scarcely a similar unanimity of view. Since their great success of Tuesday and Wednesday week, when by the force of a united majority they broke the back of Obstruction, Ministers have followed a very simple course. On that memorable occasion they gave it to be understood at the outset that they had met to pass through Committee the South Africa Bill, and that they would sit till they had finished it. The effect of this action left nothing to be desired except an enlarged opportunity for sleep on the part of hon. members. The Obstructives struggled for many hours, but in the end avowed themselves defeated, and the Bill went through Committee. In the same way the Government have dealt with all Bills which it might be expected Mr. Biggar and his friends would endeavour to obstruct. They have at the outset given it to be understood that they mean to make a certain measure of progress at a given sitting, and that the length of the sitting would depend upon the volubility of hon. members below the gangway opposite.

The effect has been an almost ludicrous collapse of the iron-bound resolution, the determination to die on the floor of the House, or at least to await the arrival of the too familiar New Zealander, which Mr. O'Connor Power once boastfully paraded. On two occasions, once on Friday and again on Tuesday, Mr. Biggar has come forward as the champion of some oppressed individual, and has asked the House to stay and listen whilst he told the story of his or her wrong. The House has stayed because it could not help it; but it has not listened, and Mr. Biggar, confounded by the clash of tongues that have kept up an endless conversation whilst he was on his feet, and abashed by the open contempt poured upon him, has presently given up the struggle, and has not even ventured to divide the House. Mr. O'Connor Power has altogether retired into the background, whilst Mr. Parnell and Mr. O'Donnell make a poor show of defiance. On Tuesday night the South Africa Bill came on for its final stage, and there were rumours about that the game of obstruction was to be played once more, and as determinedly as before. Mr. O'Donnell so far justified this expectation that he made a tremendously long speech, for which he had an audience—or at least the company—of five members. But it was a dull and spiritless affair, and after a good many thousand words Mr. O'Donnell resumed his seat, and Mr. Parnell took up the story.

When on a former occasion hon. members showed their appreciation of the sort of mental pabulum prepared for them by Mr. O'Donnell by absenting themselves with one accord, Mr. Biggar insolently rebuked them by moving repeated counts, which had the effect of giving members the trouble to return to the House for a few minutes. On Tuesday night this course was equally open to Mr. Biggar, and he was in his place to avail himself of it. But he desisted, and left Mr. O'Donnell to speak in an almost empty chamber. After midnight, Mr. Parnell, opposing the Transvaal vote, was for a moment goaded into defiance by the general attitude of the House towards him, and the curt replies of the exhausted Secretary for the Colonies. What Mr. Parnell was at was the old familiar question which has been talked about so long, and which was the immediate cause of the sitting of twenty-six hours. He raised the question in a new form, and proposed that it should all be discussed over again, a proposition to which the House demurred, and which Mr. Lowther, in the fewest possible words, declined to have anything to do with. Then Mr. Parnell's face grew ominously pale, and in his familiar manner, as a schoolmaster would threaten a recalcitrant boy with punishment, he declared that he would divide, a challenge which the House answered by uproarious cries for a division. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, however, built a golden bridge for Mr. Parnell's escape, which that hon. member thankfully accepted, and the little storm blowing over, the vote was presently agreed to. Speeches were made on other votes, but the Committee had met to pass Supply, and the conviction that it would sit till that object was accomplished had its due weight. With increasing feebleness the obstruction flickered out, and at three o'clock in the morning the last vote in Supply was agreed to, and the work of the Session of 1877 was practically brought to a close.

On Wednesday, Mr. Parnell, backed by Mr. O'Donnell and Mr. Biggar, threatened obstruction to the final stage of Supply. But they did not carry this beyond a lengthy speech apiece, and a couple of divisions. Supply passed through its last stage (merely a formal one), and the Appropriation Bill was brought in and read a first time, an event which makes it possible to look for the prorogation of Parliament on Tuesday.

SPORTING

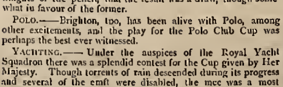
THE TURF.——Harking back for a moment to Goodwood it should be noted that Hampton's success in the Cup shows him to be about the best stayer on the Turf, and only to think that he has taken part in hurdle, and even selling races! Still he is by no means the only instance of a horse for a time thought next to nothing developing into one of the best animals of his day. All Turfmen remember the resucitation of Vulcan, and his wondrous performances. Mousquetaire's victories in the Chichester Stakes and Chesterfield Cup show what an absolute certainty the Stewards' Cup would have been for him. His scratching at the eleventh hour has marked the Goodwood gathering of 1877 with a black chalk.—The "Sussex fortnight," as it is called, included the whole of this week, even the Saturday, which was the second of the two days at Lewes. As a rule Turfmen dislike Saturday racing, but the meetings at Lewes are always so good that the violation of the unwritten law is tolerated. Brighton Downs were of course the venue for the first part of the week, and unhappily the weather for the most part so wretched that it would well nigh have satisfied the witches in Macbeth. By the way, as long ago as last January Captain Saxby prophesied that we might expect great "atmospheric disturbances" in the first fortnight in August, though usually so tranquil a month. However, the racing was first rate, though backers of favourites as a rule came to grief. The only favourite which won on the first day was Cœruleus, in the Bristol Plate. In the Corporation Stakes, for two-year-olds, the unfortunate Emily filly with almost 2 to 1 on her in a field of seven had to succumb to Insulaire. Mousquetaire, with only 5 to 2 against him in a company of eleven who started for the Marine Stakes, could not get even a place, old Caramel first catching the judge's eye; while Dalham, the favourite in the Brighton Stakes, declined to make a start at the proper time, and was last past the winning post. To make matters worse, backers laid 10 to 3 previously on Farnese for the All-Aged Stakes, but the speedy roarer could only beat one out of the three competitors, and had to succumb to Independent. The talent had a little better luck on the second day, as they spotted Advance for the Hamilton Plate and May Fair for the Pavilion Stakes; but oh! their looks when Charon beat Julius Cæsar for the Cup—an event which certainly was not to be expected, as the two four-year-olds carried 8 st. 10 lb. each. The quoted betting was 11 to 10 against Julius Cæsar, but many good judges thought it was any odds on him. The Ovingdean Plate fell to Kineton, though Violet and Inglewood Ranger were the most fancied for it. On the course the St. Leger betting was pretty extensive, Silvio and Chamant being neck-and-neck for the place of first favourite at 10 to 3.

CRICKET.——Gloucestershire has made mincemeat of Nottinghamshire, winning the match at Old Trent Bridge Ground by an innings and 48 runs. Big scores were not the order of the day, Mr. Moberley's 101 (not out) being the innings of the match.—The contest between Surrey and Sussex, which began at the Oval on the Bank Holiday, was anticipated by thousands as likely to be a good one, though several of the crack players on each side were absent, being wanted elsewhere. Unfortunately the rain on Wednesday prevented the game being played out, the wickets becoming totally unfit for cricket.—The weather, too, has marred the great annual cricket gathering at Canterbury; but balls, concerts, and private theatricals went far to atone for other disappointments. The Kent players were in rare cricketing form, especially in the batting department.—The annual match between the jockeys and members of the sporting press was played at Brighton on Monday last, but there was so much free hitting both on the part of the knights of the pigskin and on that of the knights of the pencil, that the result was a draw, though somewhat in favour of the former.

POLO.——Brighton, too, has been alive with Polo, among other excitements, and the play for the Polo Club Cup was perhaps the best ever witnessed.

YACHTING.—— Under the auspices of the Royal Yacht Squadron there was a splendid contest for the Cup given by Her Majesty. Though torrents of rain descended during its progress and several of the craft were disabled, the race was a most exciting one, and resulted eventually in the victory of the Hildegarde, belonging to the Prince of Wales.

SWIMMING.——The well-known "Professor" Cavill had a long swim on Monday last from Cape Grinez to Boulogne Harbour, a distance of fourteen miles, which he accomplished with apparent ease to himself. He intends to try and "do" the Channel in about a fortnight's time, and feels confident of success.



MUSIC

MADAME ADELINA PATTI.——Having, through her agent Signor Franchi, paid M. Léon Escudier the "dédit" of 100,000 francs, as agreed upon should she be disabled from fulfilling her engagement with that impresario, it seems evident that Madame Patti will not appear during the forthcoming season at the Théâtre Ventadour; on the other hand, should circumstances be modified, she can only sing at the Italian Opera; so that, in any case, M. Escudier may congratulate himself on having made an excellent bargain. According to the generally well-informed Ménestrel (which is at variance with Galignani), Madame Patti, for the present, abandons the idea of visiting the United States. There is, in other quarters, some talk of a winter series of performances in the principal Scandinavian towns, to precede those for which she has already stipulated in the Austrian capital.

MDLLE. TITIENS.——The idea of Mdlle. Titiens' appearing at either the Gloucester or the Leeds Festival is, according to recent information, not for a moment to be entertained. She has had a relapse, and a fresh operation would seem to be impending. We regret to impart such bad news to her many admirers among the English public; but it is of no use concealing the truth. A week since there appeared to be some prospect of amendment; but this is proved to be illusory. Mdlle. Titiens is still at Worthing, there being little chance just now of her being removed to her home in St. John's Wood.

MR. TOWNSHEND SMITH.——The sudden death of Mr. Townshend Smith, for more than a quarter of a century organist of Hereford Cathedral and conductor of Hereford Festival, will throw a gloom over the ensuing Gloucester meeting, in which he was prepared, with his accustomed activity, to take part. Mr. Smith was always a staunch upholder of the Three Choir Festivals, and will be missed as greatly at Worcester and Gloucester as at Hereford, where he was domiciled and where he died, on Saturday evening last, after a few hours' indisposition. He was an amiable, intelligent, and clever man—popular among all with whom he came in contact. He leaves a wife and family. Mr. Montem Smith, the cathedral tenor, is his surviving brother.

WAIFS.—M. Gounod has been promoted, by the President of the French Republic, to the rank of Commander of the Legion of Honour.—Among recent deaths announced by foreign journals are those of Madame Montessu (Asnières), one of the most famous operatic dancers when "ballet of action" was in its prime, and the original of Hérold's Somnambule; Auguste Pilate (Hospital St. Louis, Paris), for many years chef d'orchestre at the Porte Saint Martin, a composer of some distinction, who assisted M. Flotow in his four-act opera, the Naufrage de la Méduse, and in 1837 wrote music to the King of the Danube for our London Adelphi; Warot, father of the well-known Belgian tenor of that name (Bois des Colombes), composer, conductor, actor, and singer in one, whose works comprise examples of every style, instrumental as well as vocal; and Guiseppe-Maria Luzzi (Naples), for many years impresario of the San Carlino, a theatre in which the old Neapolitan style of comedy has always found a home.—The new opera of M. Camille Saint-Saens, called Etienne Marcel, will not be brought out in Paris, as had been expected, but at Lyons, next winter. If we may judge from the impression created by the Timbale d'Argent, M. de Saint-Saens' most recent dramatic work, the Parisians are not greatly to be commiserated. Without a shadow of Wagner's genius, this newly-extolled French composer becomes day after day more hopelessly Wagnerian.—M. Ambroise Thomas is busy at Argenteuil, where he has a country seat, putting the finishing touches to his Francesca di Rimini, and composing ballet music for that long-expected work, as well as for his last-projected opera, Psyché.—The well-known firm of Chickering and Son (New York and Boston) have celebrated the manufacture of their 50,000th pianoforte, by instituting a library for the exclusive use of their overseers and workmen.—Mr. Carl Rosa's Opera Company opened on Monday night at Dublin with an English version of Il Trovatore. Mr. Rosa, who seems always changing his mind—it being now Wagner's Meistersinger, now Macfarren's Robin Hood, now Weber's Oberon, now Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, and so on—has at last fixed upon the Mignon of M. Ambroise Thomas for Miss Gaylord. What next? Mr. Rosa has no intention of giving performances in London this year. Alas! for poor English opera (or opera in English); no one has any faith in it.—For the present the idea of holding Promenade Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre seems to be in abeyance, but in place of them, we understand, Italian operatic performances at moderate prices are to be instituted. We shall see.—A paragraph which appeared not long ago in some of the papers stating that the works connected with the "Grand National Opera" on the Thames Embankment were speedily to be resumed, turned out, as might have been guessed beforehand, incorrect. Proof positive of this has been vouchsafed by Mr. Mapleson himself in a letter to The Times, which will hardly have escaped the attention of our opera-going readers.—Dr. Hans von Bülow has accepted the post of conductor at the Glasgow Autumn and Winter Subscription Concerts, in place of Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, who has resigned. Tout est pour le mieux (dans ces meilleurs des concerts possibles); we doubt, nevertheless, if the change will be advantageous.—Madame Rosa Csillag, once, at Vienna (1852-3), the rival of Mdlle. Titiens, and remembered by frequenters of Mr. Gye's theatre in Fidelio, Orphée (Gluck), and other operas, is now established as a professor of singing and declamation at the Vienna Conservatory.—Liszt and Wagner have been staying together at Weimar, consulting, it is believed, about the fittest means of producing the now nearly completed opera, Parcival, latest composition of the author of Der Ring des Nibelungen.—Flotow, the composer, has disposed of his estate at Reichenau, and now resides at his villa in Mecklenburg.

SCRAPS

SOME OF THE GEMS STOLEN FROM THE BRITISH MUSEUM are said to have been discovered in the shop of a dealer in antiques in Brussels.

A ROCK LADEN WITH LEADEN ORE has been discovered on the west coast of Jersey. The ore is of good quality, and there are said to be indications of argentiferous ore.

A CERTAIN COMPOSER OF COMIC SONGS, by name M. Edmond L'Herillier, has, if we are to believe the Echo, been appointed by the Sultan to "elevate" the tone of Turkish military music!

THE COLORADO BEETLE has at length been officially identified in Liverpool by Mr. Moore, Curator of the Free Public Museum. It was captured aboard an American steamer in that port, and has been forwarded to the Home Office for further examination.

SOME OF THE EMPRESS OF INDIA'S SUBJECTS, Mayfair tells us, have hit on a novel plan of spoiling the Egyptians, and at the same time of gratifying their anti-Russian sympathies. The butchers of Bangalore have raised the price of meat, in order to show their devotion to the Moslem faith by presenting the overplus so obtained to the relief of the suffering Turkish soldiers.

RUBENS TERCENTENARY.——Information has been received by the Department of Science and Art, through Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that it is intended to hold an Art Congress at Antwerp on the 19th of this month, on the occasion of the tercentenary of the birth of Rubens. Further details with respect to the proposed celebration may be obtained on application to Monsieur Leopold de Wael, Burgomaster of Antwerp.

MISTAKING HIS ELEMENT.——"Why," remarks the Theatre, "a celebrated provincial actor should throw off his coat, waistcoat, and boots, when about to enter a house on fire for the laudable purpose of saving a brother actor's child (a property one), we know not. Perhaps he considered it would add to the dramatic effect, or possibly he thought he had the chance of securing the Royal Humane Society's medal. In his previous part he had to perform a rescue from drowning."

LABELLING BABY CARRIAGES is the latest idea across the Atlantic, and a correspondent of the Albany Sunday Press congratulates the citizens on the appearance in the Park of one of these tiny equipages, on the side of which was inscribed on a plate the name of its inmate's parent—a respected neighbour. If the suggestion were adopted it would certainly serve as some check upon pretty nursemaids who neglect their charge for the sake of a chat with a masculine acquaintance who has taken the opportunity to inquire, "Whose pretty baby have you there?"

A CURIOUSLY MISTAKEN CASE OF HYDROPHOBIA has occurred in Rome. According to the Pall Mall Gazette, at the hospital of St. John Lateran a patient was admitted the other day apparently suffering from hydrophobia. It was a hopeless case, the patient was nearly dying, when a person brought up a piece of cord worn by St. Domenico, and directed that it should be steeped in water and the water administered to the sufferer, as it was an infallible remedy in cases of hydrophobia! This was accordingly done, but the cord had lost its efficacy, for the patient died shortly after, proving, as the believers say, that it must have been some other disease, not hydrophobia, for the cord could not fail. And this was in a public hospital under medical supervision!

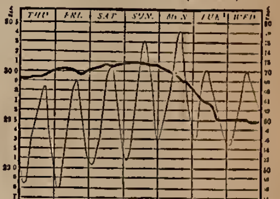
TWO ISLANDS HAVE DISAPPEARED from off the Australian coast—the Barker Islands and their inhabitants. A Captain Fisher, a Tasmanian capitalist, had purchased from the West Australian Government the right to remove guano from these islands, which were situated in lat. 14 S., long. 125 E., and despatched three vessels thither in April. When the vessel arrived, however, at the presumed locality of the islands they were not to be seen, and they are supposed to have disappeared through some volcanic disturbance. It was generally imagined that Australia lay out of the line of active volcanic agency, so that the phenomenon is all the more remarkable. We wonder whether Captain Fisher intends to sue the Western Australian Government for "non-delivery of goods."

LONDON MORTALITY increased slightly last week, and the deaths numbered 1,439 against 1,430 during the previous seven days, being 203 below the average, and at the rate of 21·3 per 1,000. There were 22 deaths from small-pox (a decrease of 5), 176 from diarrhœa (a decline of 8), 51 from measles, 22 from fever (a fall of 2), 15 from scarlet fever (a decrease of 10), 21 from whooping-cough (a fall of 2), and 8 from diphtheria (an increase of 4); different forms of violence caused 49 deaths, and 45 were the result of negligence or accident, including 10 from drowning. There were 2,408 births registered—a decline of 21, but 55 above the average. The mean temperature was 63·3° and 1·1° above the average. The duration of sunshine last week was 46·6 hours out of the 107·4 hours that the sun was above the horizon.

THE PLANE TREES IN THE CITY OF LONDON, the Gardener's Magazine tells us, are at the present time in the most perfect state of leafage and colour. The limes have lost their brightness, the elms are of a deep sombre green hue, but the planes are golden green and glorious in the sunshine. An amusing study of town trees may be pursued in a walk through the gardens of the Temple, and thence along the Thames Embankment. The well-known Fountain Court is now exquisitely beautiful, and we recommend any one interested in City trees to visit the spot while it is at its best—on one side delicately garlanded with greenery, and the fountain throwing its simple column of water beside one of the finest plane trees in London. The plane trees of the Temple have been but little pruned at any time, and they contrast in a striking manner with the lean, systematically-pruned trees on the Embankment.

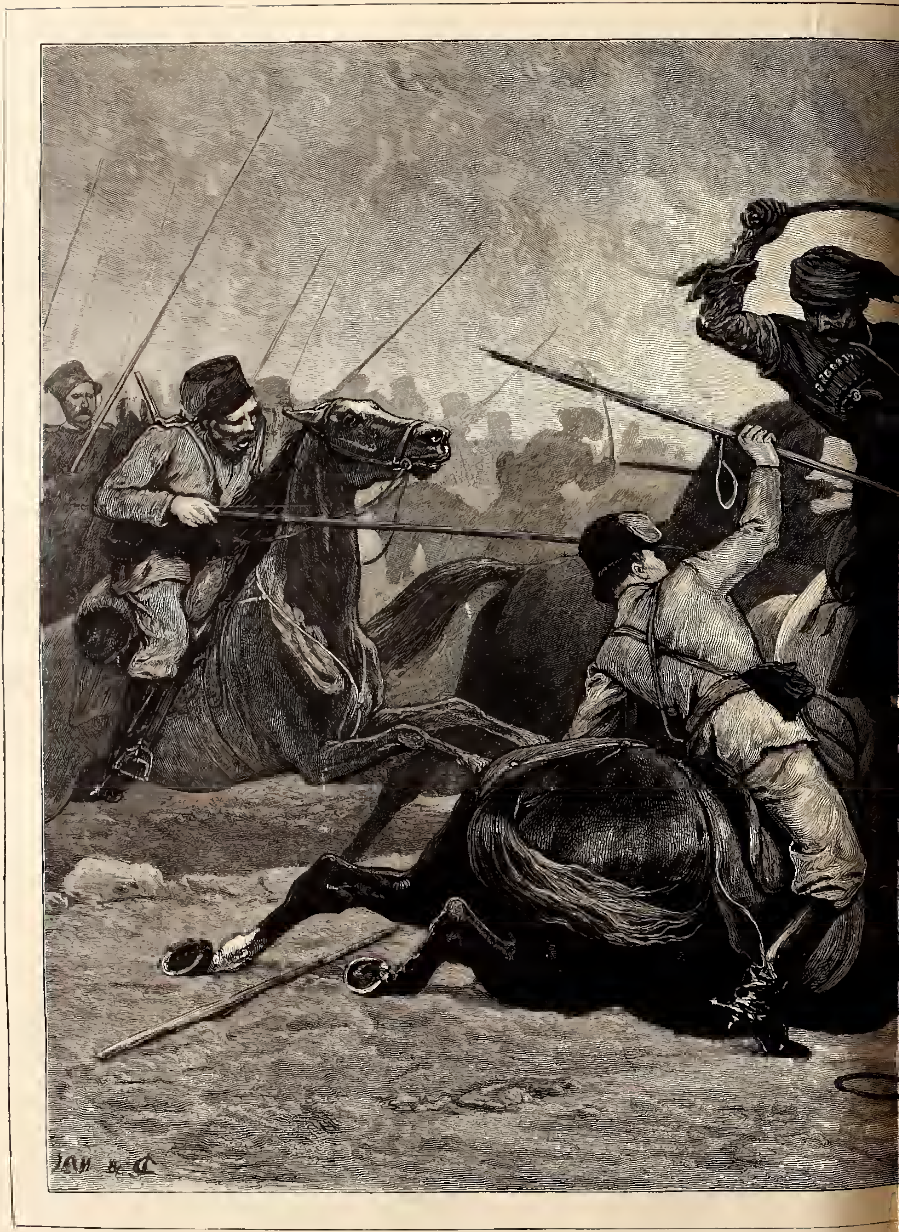
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

AUGUST 2ND TO AUGUST 8TH (INCLUSIVE)

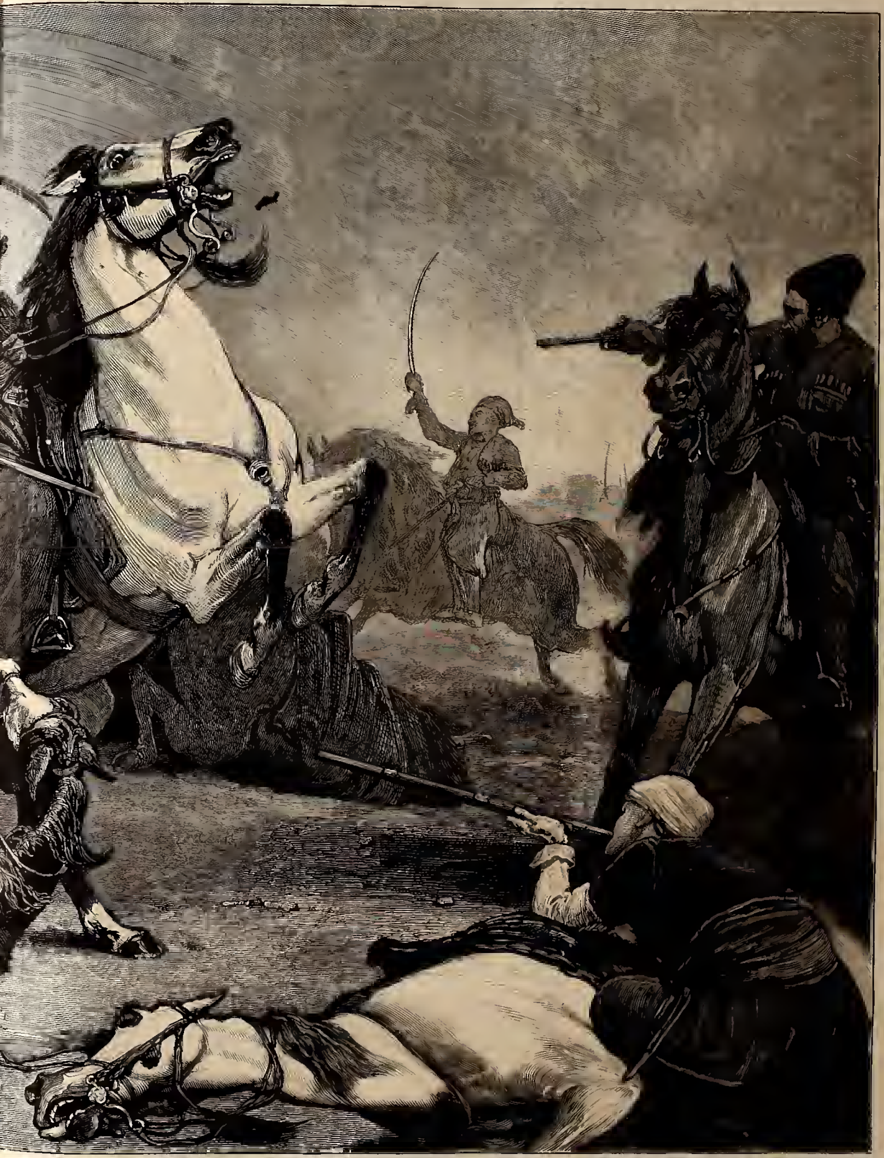


EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The weather during this period has been very different from that which immediately preceded it. The very high temperatures then recorded gave way suddenly at the close of July, so that the maximum heat in the shade which we recorded on the 2nd was 67°, or 19° lower than that on July 31st. North-westerly winds then prevailed, and at first blew freshly; but on Friday, the 3rd instant, they lulled to a light breeze, and on Saturday, the 4th instant, southerly winds began to appear again on our western coasts, and gradually extended all over the country. It will be seen on referring to our diagram that the thermometer became higher and higher till Monday, the 6th instant, when 78° was reached as the maximum. The same day the barometer began to fall fast, and the southerly wind gradually increased in strength till Wednesday, the 8th instant, when strong squally winds were experienced, with heavy falls of rain. The barometer was highest (30·08 inches) on Sunday, the 5th instant; lowest (29·48 inches) on Wednesday, the 8th instant; range, 0·60 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (78°) on Monday, the 6th instant; lowest (46°) on Friday, the 3rd instant; range, 32°. The wind was north-westerly until Saturday, the 4th instant, and southerly and south-easterly afterwards. Rainfall: Total fall, 0·56 inch, on five days; greatest fall in one day, 0·25 inch, on Wednesday, the 8th instant. On Thursday morning last the wind had veered to west-south-west, and fallen lightly, the barometer was rising, but the sky still had a showery appearance.



THE WAR IN THE EAST—COMBAT BETWEEN COSSACKS AN



BASHI-BAZOUKS NEAR THE VILLAGE OF HAIDAR KEUI, JULY 16

FOREIGN

The War in the East.——The tide of success has for the present decidedly turned in favour of the Turks, and both North and South of the Balkans the Russians have suffered serious reverses. The Russian defeat at Plevna appears from the fuller reports to have been more complete than was at first believed, and even the Russian official account estimates the loss of men at 5,000—a number increased to 10,000 by the correspondents of The Times and Daily News. As we shall fully illustrate the chief scenes of the battle next week we reserve details, but we may mention that the Russians retired in good order, and maintain their positions at Poredin and Tirstenik. Our artist, Mr. Villiers, had a narrow escape from falling into the hands of the Bashi-Bazouks, having at first been reported to have joined an ambulance, of which the whole, wounded and attendants, were massacred, but by a fortunate accident he had travelled with another party, and so managed to join the other correspondents at Bucharest.

To resume our chronicle of the war. Osman Pasha made no attempt to pursue the Russians, but remained quiet until Friday, when a detachment under Abdul Pasha occupied Selvi—a position of considerable importance, as it brings the Turks within twenty-five miles of Tirnova, and twenty miles of Gabrova, the Russian station at the head of the Shipka Pass. The Russians, however, are hurrying reinforcements to the front, some drawn from the Dobrudscha and others from the forces investing Rustchuk and Silistria; while the whole of the Imperial Guard has been ordered out from St. Petersburg, an Imperial Ukase summons 188,000 of the Landwehr of the First Class, and the garrison of Poland has been set free by calling out the Militia. The Roumanian Railway is entirely monopolised for the transport of the fresh forces, whose arrival will create considerable difficulty as to the food supplies, which are already reported to be scanty between Tirnova and Sistova, owing to the bad roads and the paucity of waggons. It is reported that the Grand Duke Nicholas has vainly requested the Czar to remove from Biela to Simnitza, and hints are freely given that had His Majesty been at Moscow the present defeats would not have occurred. The Czar's health is said to be bad, and his absence from the seat of war is generally recommended. A battle is reported to have taken place on Tuesday at Vladina, a village between Loftcha and Plevna, in which Osman Pasha was successful. The Russians were the aggressors. Osman Pasha's occupation of Selvi brings him a step nearer Mehemet Ali, and enables him to threaten the communications between Tirnova and the Shipka Pass. Thus the position of General Gourko, who is now driven back into the Balkans, becomes somewhat critical, especially as Suleiman and Reouf Pashas captured Eski Sagra on Tuesday week, taking five guns. Suleiman Pasha then subsequently occupied Kesanlik at the foot of the Shipka Pass on Saturday, and seized the Hain Boghaz Pass, the mountain path by which the Russians crossed. General Gourko—who, according to the Agence Russe, was the victor in two minor engagements—still holds the Shipka Pass, but his force has been weakened by the despatch of four battalions to Plevna, and he is said to be short of provisions. Should Mehemet Ali and Osman Pasha effect a junction he will be fairly caught in a trap. Mehemet Ali, however, has been busy organising his troops, turning Rasgrad into a fortified camp, and appointing fresh commanders. He is said to be waiting for the division of Ahmet Eyoub,—who has now been replaced by Reouf Pasha,—for the 20,000 men from Batoum and for the Egyptian force under Prince Hassan, so as to strike a decisive blow at the Russians on the Lom. Prince Hassan has been protecting Mehemet's rear from General Zimmermann's corps in the Dobrudscha, where there is much sickness. General Zimmermann has failed to effect a junction with the Czarewitch, and the latter, whose troops are also in a sickly condition, raised the siege of Rustchuk on Saturday, telegraphic and railway communication between the fortress and Shumla being re-established next day. The siege, however, will probably be renewed shortly, as reinforcements were crossing the Danube on Sunday. The fall of Widdin, where there are 12,000 troops, is expected, and the Austrian Steam Navigation Company propose to reopen the traffic on the Lower Danube as soon as the fortress surrenders.

From Asia there is little news save of insignificant skirmishes. The Russians are preparing to resume the offensive, and 15,000 fresh soldiers have crossed the frontier near Ani on the left bank of the Arpatchj river. The Russian centre numbers sixty-eight battalions with 8,500 cavalry under General Melikoff, while General Tergoukassoff is on the frontier at Kara Doulak. Mukhtar Pasha has retired nearer Kars, and has sent his heavy baggage into the fortress. Dysentery has broken out in his camp. In the Caucasus, according to the Daily Telegraph, Hobart Pasha and his fleet have been embarking Circassian emigrants at Soukhum Kaleh. Hobart Pasha, after destroying the Russian fort at Tchamtchira, rescued 6,000 Turkish troops who were there in a perilous position, and took them to Soukhum Kaleh. After all the emigrants are on board he will re-embark the troops, and the Caucasian expedition will be finally withdrawn.

Throughout Bulgaria the Russians continue to organise local governments, and Prince Tcherkasky intends to divide the province into districts, administered by a governor, vice-governor, and a finance counsellor. The mutual accusations of atrocities remain as violent as ever, the most important charges being the mutilation of the Russian wounded at Plevna, on the one side; and on the other, the cruelties at Eski Saghra, where the Russians are alleged to have killed 1,100 Mussulmans in eleven days.

St. Petersburg is seriously depressed by the Russian reverses, and a grand procession bearing the Turkish trophies captured at Nikopol to the Trinity church failed to cheer the population. The absence of news from the seat of war is bitterly felt throughout the Empire, as no lists of killed and wounded are published.—Constantinople is naturally jubilant, and rumours of peace are current. Nevertheless, a special guard is to be formed, and a camp of 70,000 men established for the defence of the capital. The Sultan has decorated Osman Pasha, and has sent an envoy to thank Suleiman. The trial of Abdul Kerim, Redif Pasha, and several others, has commenced, and Abdul Kerim is reported to defend his inaction as the result of instructions from Redif Pasha, who in his turn is likely to need little defence, as he is alleged to be dying of poison. All public officials are to be mulcted of half their salaries for four months, the money being regarded as a loan.

In Bosnia there has been a Turkish victory over the insurgent Despotovitch, who has been compelled to cross the frontier into Austria, where he will be interned.—In Montenegro the conflict continues with little variation.—Servia is quietly mobilising under the pretext of protecting the frontier; the Skuptschina has been prorogued after voting the continuance of the tribute to the Porte, and authorising the Government to declare the independence of the Principality in case of need; and it is reported that the Czar has asked Austria to agree to the passage of Russian reinforcements through Prince Milan's dominions. Rumours are rife of an alliance with Greece, both countries to declare war simultaneously. The Hellenic forces are estimated at 40,000 men.

Austria continues to mobilise, and has made arrangements for the necessary funds. Turkophile meetings have been held all over Hungary; there has been a grand Polish demonstration at Lemberg; and Herr Tisza has received a deputation protesting against Russian cruelties. The Emperors of Austria and Germany met at Ischl on Wednesday, and great expectations of alliance were aroused by the interview. Should Roumania and Servia take the field, Austria may perhaps occupy Bosnia. M. Cogalniceano's attempt at Vienna to get the independence of Roumania recognised has proved fruitless.

France.——The electoral campaign continues the all-absorbing topic, and there is little news of anything save preparations for the struggle. The elections are not likely to be held before October 14, and as another fortnight will be spent in verifying the returns the Chamber cannot meet before November. Some time will then be occupied in settling the preliminaries of the new Chamber, and if, as is thought very probable, a Ministerial crisis should arise, business will be further delayed until December. Of course the usual tactics are being pursued by the Government, which continues to dismiss Prefects and Mayors, dissolve Municipal Councils, and put down all meetings likely to bear the slightest tinge of a political character. Thus the annual musical festival at Beziers has been forbidden on the plea of the opinions of the honorary Presidents, two ex-deputies; an organ-grinder was recently arrested for playing the "Marseillaise," and in the Southern Departments the restrictive measures anent the closing of wine-shops are so severe that the peasants, driven from their usual haunts, meet at each other's houses to play cards, and significantly style the loser a "Broglie." Reports are abroad of a Ministry of Conciliation to be formed by M. Dufaure, assisted by the Left Centre and a few members of the Right who supported the vote of May 16, with the view of replacing the Marshal in the position he occupied before the present crisis. It is certain that the Cabinet is much harried by its Bonapartist and Legitimist allies, the Ultramontanes urging the utter destruction of Radicalism. "Strike at the head and heart," says the Défense, Mgr. Dupanloup's organ.

The Bonapartists have temporarily patched-up their family quarrel to combine against the common enemy, and MM. Rouher and Cassagnac have ceased their recriminations. They do not appear very sanguine as to their success in the coming elections, and M. de Cassagnac carefully disclaims all responsibility of the present crisis, stating that if the Conservatives are beaten the Bonapartists will not be affected by the blow which shatters the Government. The aid of the Vatican has been secured to them, according to a letter from Cardinal Simeoni to the Paris Nuncio, wherein he recommends the support of Napoleon IV., believing that the Empire and the Republic are the only probable Governments of France, and evidently choosing the lesser evil of the two. The Cardinal deplores French neutrality in the Eastern Question, and declares a European war preferable to the Revolutionary avalanche likely to engulf monarchies and religion.

The chief interest of the week has centred in M. Thiers' visit to Stors, near L'Isle Adam, where he introduced M. Sénard as a candidate, and received a most enthusiastic greeting, being deafened with shouts of "Vive la République," and smothered in flowers. There was little notable in his speech, in which he stated his belief that "to-day the Republic only is possible," and commended the continuance of the Republican campaign to younger men than himself. M. Sénard, however, is only three years his junior. On their side the Government hope to outshine M. Thiers' warm reception by provincial demonstrations in favour of Marshal MacMahon, who has decided on visiting the chief industrial centres of France, and who will go to Rouen and St. Etienne with the intention of reassuring the manufacturers as to the effects of the situation on commercial interests.—The Reservists are to be called out for three weeks on the 20th inst. The Commission appointed to consider the condition of the Reformed Church has reported in favour of mutual concession on the part of both the Orthodox and the Liberals, and recommends that the Synod should be convened to consider a compromise.

Paris has been more than usually lively this week, and has been much interested in the Patti trial, wherein the Marquise de Caux was condemned in a remarkably plain verdict, the required separation was pronounced, and costs were laid to the charge of the Marquise. The distribution of the prizes at the Sorbonne was expected to give rise to a political manifestation, but the Minister of Public Instruction, who presided, wisely held his tongue on the dangerous subject. Considerable amusement has been created by M. A. Dumas having been chosen to deliver the address on the prizes for virtue at the French Académie. M. Dumas, however, merely delivered a prosy and not-specially original discourse.—The Mot d'Ordre has met with another condemnation for attacking religion and the Government, and M. Rochefort has been condemned to two months' imprisonment and a fine of 80*l*.—There have been two revivals—Racine's Andromaque at the Français and Halévy's Reine de Chypre at the Opera, both great successes in spite of the heat and the absence of the artistic world.

United States.——The disturbances are now dying out, strong garrisons of troops are stationed in Luzerne county, and traffic has been pretty generally resumed. The miners' strike, however, continues in Maryland, where they demand an advance of wages, but in most other places the mines have been pumped out and the colliers are at work. All fear of a renewal of the movement is not, however, past, and the Pittsburg Committee of Safety has asked the Government to maintain a permanent garrison of Federal troops. The actual damage done is estimated at 1,000,000*l*. The labour question is to be brought before Congress by the President's message at the opening of the October Session, and a Commission of Investigation on the recent riots will probably be advocated. The bad state of the trade and the continual disputes with employers has induced a number of carpenters to emigrate to Great Britain, where they are promised work. They left Philadelphia last week, notwithstanding the efforts of the New York carpenters' trade union.—Forest fires are beginning, and the village of Eaton, in Wisconsin, has been burned.—The sale of arms to the Indians has been prohibited.

India.——The famine accounts are a little more favourable, and the Viceroy reports that the prospects of the season are improved in Madras, more rain having fallen. Nevertheless there will be serious distress in Madras this winter, and at a meeting held under the presidency of the Duke of Buckingham on Saturday it was decided to appeal to the British public for help. At present 1,750,000 persons are receiving assistance, the increased mortality has reached half a million, and the better classes are beginning to suffer, while the pressure cannot possibly be relieved until the January crops are gathered. In Bombay the monsoon is insufficient and prices are high, and indeed Burmah and Assam are the only provinces furnishing satisfactory reports.—The Indian Navy is to be re-established.—The Indian Mahometans have been holding thanksgiving services for the Turkish victories.

Miscellaneous.——Germany is regretting Field-Marshal Von Steinmetz, an able officer who died suddenly last week at Landeck, aged 83. The German coast has been undergoing Admiralty inspection, and is reported to be prepared for war and practically unassailable. Prince Bismarck is going to Gastein.—In Italy the Vatican is disputing with Russia on the reported forthcoming exile of the Capuchin Friars from Poland. Should the Friars be turned out the Pope will make a public protest. Yesterday (Friday) a congregation of Cardinals was to meet at the Vatican to reply to the Pope's queries whether he had pursued the right course with regard to the position of the Holy See and the Italian Government, and whether any change should be made. Cardinal Simeoni has sent a circular to the various Nuncios stating that in the event of the election of a new Pope the changes in the formalities will not interfere with the rights of the Catholic Powers. He also intends to admonish Eastern Catholic Bishops to recommend the submission of their flocks to the decrees of the conquerors.—Spain is desirous to conclude a new treaty of commerce and navigation with England and France on a basis of reciprocity.—In Canada the murderer of the Orangeman, Mr. Hackett, who was shot during the disturbance at Montreal on July 12, has been committed for trial, and the poorhouse at Simcoe, Ontario, has been burnt, with a loss of seventeen lives.—The Convention between England and Egypt for the suppression of the Slave Trade was signed at Alexandria on Saturday.

THE COURT

The principal members of the Royal Family are now in the Isle of Wight. The Queen continues to drive out daily with the Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, while the young Princes William and Henry of Prussia have been staying with Her Majesty at Osborne. Prince William, however, returned to London on the 3rd inst., being accompanied in the Alberta as far as Portsmouth by Prince Leopold and Prince Henry. On Saturday the Queen received Captain Ulffas and the officers of the German frigate Niobe, in which the young Princes had arrived, and afterwards the Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and Prince Henry of Prussia visited the frigate in Cowes Road. In the evening Lord John Manners dined with Her Majesty. On Sunday Her Majesty and Prince Henry attended Divine Service at Osborne, the Rev. William Barker, Vicar of St. Mary's, West Cowes, and Honorary Chaplain to the Queen, officiating. Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, however, attended service at Whippingham Church. On Monday Prince Henry of Prussia left Osborne and rejoined the Niobe, and Lord John Manners also quitted Osborne. In the afternoon the Queen and the Princess Beatrice were present at a cricket-match between the Osborne Cricket Club and the officers and men of the Royal Yacht. On Tuesday Prince Leopold left in the Alberta for Portsmouth on his way to Boyton Manor. In the afternoon Lord Lyons arrived, and had an audience with Her Majesty. In the evening he dined with the Queen and the Princess Beatrice, and on Wednesday he left Osborne.

The Prince of Wales and his four younger children, Prince George and the Princesses Maud, Victoria, and Louise, are also in the Isle of Wight, having left Marlborough House on Monday, crossing over from Portsmouth on board the Royal yacht Osborne, which for the present is the home of the Prince and his children. The Osborne was received at Cowes by a salute of twenty-one guns from H.M.S. Lord Warden, and in the evening the Prince dined at the Royal Yacht Squadron Club House. On Tuesday the Prince and his children visited Her Majesty. The Princess of Wales, together with Prince Albert Victor, who is now fast approaching recovery, will probably join the Prince at the close of next week. The drainage of Marlborough House, where it is supposed that the young Prince contracted his illness, is to be thoroughly reorganised, and, according to the Medical Examiner, negotiations are in progress for securing an excellent mansion with a fine park in the north of London, which will be used as a kind of nursery for the Royal children in the London season.

The thirty-third birthday of the Duke of Edinburgh was kept on Monday with the usual salutes and rejoicings.—On Monday Prince William of Prussia visited Woolwich, and next day, with his suite, left for the Continent on his return home.—Prince Louis Napoleon is staying at Cowes.—Prince Gustav von Vasa, father of the Queen of Saxony, died at Pillnitz on Saturday, at the age of seventy-eight.

CHURCH NEWS

The Ritualists.——The first anniversary of the Church of England Working Men's Society took place on Saturday, celebrations "for the intentions of the society" being held at about a hundred churches. The service at St. Alban's, Holborn, was of a very advanced type. Mr. Tooth, who preached, said that the time for compromise was past and gone, and Christianity must realise its first principles and fight for life. They would have avoided the conflict if possible, but when they considered that compromise in such a cause was a contradiction, and therefore a lie, they must never be betrayed into accepting it. In the evening the members of the society met at the Cannon Street Hotel, under the presidency of Mr. W. Inglis, of Leeds, who reviewed the work of the Association during the year, and exhorted them to renewed efforts. Resolutions condemning the Public Worship Act, and pledging the members to agitate against it, expressing sympathy with the Society of the Holy Cross, and protesting against prosecutions were unanimously passed.—An amusing suggestion for evading the law with regard to Vestments has been made in all seriousness by the Church Times, which in a lengthy article points out how a kind of combination of alb and chasuble can be so contrived that the new garment may serve all the purposes of the Eucharistic vesture and yet in the eye of the law be simply a surplice. The Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, however, objects to this hybrid garment as utterly novel, and as neither Anglican, Roman, nor Greek, and therefore not Catholic. His intention is to continue the use of the vestments without any kind of shifting or compromise. The Church Times rejoins that Mr. Bennett has mistaken the point of the suggestion, which is simply to "Sew a linen alb and chasuble together so as to make them one vestment, call it a surplice, and defy the Courts to prove it anything else. It is neither a sham nor a novelty, save for one seam in the stitching."—Monsignor Capel preached two sermons at Liverpool on Sunday on auricular confession. He denied the existence of any relations between Catholics and Anglicans. If the latter took their opinions and imitated their practice they did it of themselves. Their earnestness and devotedness proved them to be worthy of a better cause than striving to Catholicise the Church of England. The Catholic Church gave authority for the Confessional, but those who had undertaken Confession in the Church of England had no authority to do what they did, and were acting contrary to the Thirty-nine Articles, by which they were bound. They said they were one of the branches of the Catholic Church, but he protested against such a statement, for the Catholic Church had no relationship with them.

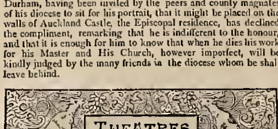
The Wesleyan Conference has continued its sittings at Bristol. On Friday last the Rev. H. Sprague, of St. John's, New Brunswick, gave an account of the recent terrible fire in that city. Before the catastrophe the Methodists had four stately churches in the city and three parsonages, and of them only one church and one parsonage had been saved; and of one congregation consisting of 145 families no fewer than 120 had lost their homes. A subscription for the relief of the sufferers was immediately commenced among the ministers assembled in conference. The affairs of the Sabbath Committee were next discussed, and some regret was expressed that Dean Stanley should have placed himself at the head of an organisation for the opening of museums on the Lord's Day. On Saturday the pastoral address of the Conference to the Societies was read and approved. It spoke of the increase of membership at home and abroad, deprecated the growing sentiment that Church fellowship is not essential to Christian life, and the notion that any external observances or generous beneficence can compensate for the lack of spiritual transformation and devotedness to Christ. It urged upon the members the need of an intelligent piety, the duty of religious reading, the importance of acquaintance with the standards of theology, and especially the necessity of carefully studying God's Word. On Monday the subject of "Lay Representation" was entered upon, and a number of resolutions were passed, it being agreed that the system should be put in operation at the Congress of 1878; that ministers only should vote for the election of ministerial representatives, and laymen only for representatives of their own order; and that no lay candidate should be eligible unless his membership in the Society was of five years' continuous duration. The debate, although at times excited, was conducted throughout with marked courtesy and good feeling.

United Methodist Free Churches.——The Conference of this influential body of Methodists was held at Louth, and came to an end on Friday last after a sitting of ten days. The numerical strength of the body shows an increase of 24 ministers and 1,680 Church-members during the year. In the course of the proceedings a resolution was passed expressing the hearty thanks of the assembly to Earl Granville for his "caution, firmness, and courtesy" during the discussion of the Burials Bill. Another resolution was passed to the effect that the Assembly viewed with anxiety the divided state of the Church of England, and the existence in its midst of thoroughly Popish doctrines, Mariolatry and Sacramental Confession in particular, to the danger of civil and religious liberty; and further that the Assembly was convinced that the sure corrective check to these monstrous and menacing innovations was the speedy and complete disestablishment of the Church of England, and a return to the inalienable rights of free speech and private judgment.

Various.——The Bishop of Manchester, speaking after a luncheon at Warrington last week, denied that he had ever said he would rather resign than enforce the Public Worship Act. He had never said anything so foolish. He thought that there was an unreasonable amount of alarm respecting the great conspiracy to overthrow the Protestant character of the Church of England. In his own diocese, where there were 750 clergymen, the conspirators were remarkably few, for he could count them on the fingers of a single hand.—Dr. Baring, the Bishop of Durham, having been invited by the peers and county magnates of his diocese to sit for his portrait, that it might be placed on the walls of Auckland Castle, the Episcopal residence, has declined the compliment, remarking that he is indifferent to the honour, and that it is enough for him to know that when he dies his work for his Master and His Church, however imperfect, will be kindly judged by the many friends in the diocese whom be shall leave behind.



THEATRES

The well-deserved success of the children's pantomime at the Adelphi Theatre last season is so likely to have impressed the mind of the servile herd of plagiarists and imitators that none can blame Mr. Chatterton for determining to be early in the field with a new piece of the same original and attractive kind. It is true that by choosing the commencement of the month of August for this purpose be may have exhibited more anxiety to take time by the forelock than was imperatively necessary, but that really concerns nobody but Mr. Chatterton himself, or the accomplished writer who chooses to conceal himself under the nom de plume of "The Old Boy." Though this is not exactly holiday time, we presume that the management are of opinion that there is always a certain number of young folks who require occasional amusement; and there is a prettiness of a poetical and imaginative kind in these productions which renders them not altogether beneath the notice of older visitors. It is to be observed that strict association of pantomime with Christmas cannot after all lay claim to be founded on ancient precedent, but is rather in itself an innovation; nor do there appear to be any grounds of objection to pantomime in the summer months analogous to the obvious reasons why oysters are not to be eaten in June, or great-coats to be worn when the thermometer averages 70° in the shade. Altogether, as good a case may perhaps be made out for the production of the new children's pantomime of Little Red Riding Hood at the Adelphi Theatre on Saturday evening as for any other sort of theatrical novelty in the dead season; and even if it should prove otherwise it may be urged that the penalty will fall on the management alone. Apart from this we can assure our readers that "The Old Boy" displays once more that sympathy with the tastes of young folks which was so conspicuous in his first effort in this way. The choice of an old-fashioned nursery story is an excellent sign; and it is equally satisfactory to find the tale treated tenderly, and the legend of little Red Riding Hood and the wolf restored to the picturesque historical land of Normandy to which it appears that it originally belongs. Although Little Goody Two Shoes had already disclosed the existence among us of a very considerable amount of juvenile talent we may still be permitted to admire the varied abilities of these little performers, and to marvel at the success with which they have been trained; the steps and movements of the Infant Cerito possess indeed a grace which few grown-up professors of dancing are able to attain. Then there is Miss Emelie Grattan, who is quite an ideal Rose de l'Amour, which is, we understand, the true name of the heroine as appears in Perrault's story of Le Petit Chaperon Rouge. With these are Master Grattan and Master Napier Barry, Miss Blanch and Miss Nerill, Miss Cooper and Miss Lizzie Seymour; besides the representatives of the "fairies of the fruits," of the "peasants and country lasses," and of the Miller's men. All these pertain to the opening story, which has been provided with very picturesque scenery, as well a "grand pantomimical transformation," the glittering splendours of which are, we suppose, an indispensable concomitant of pantomime no matter of what season. Lastly, there is a double harlequinade, in which those nimble and graceful representatives of harlequin Miss C. Gilchrist and Miss Bella Goward are supported by Miss Coote and Miss Taylor as Columbines; while Masters Bertie Coote and Alfred West, and Masters Meadows and Wilson again represent the Clowns and Pantaloons with scrupulous regard to the traditions of this form of entertainment, and much to the delight of youthful visitors. Little Red Riding Hood is performed nightly by way of afterpiece to the drama of The Streets of London; but there are to be morning performances every Wednesday till further notice.

A new play by Mr. Paul Merritt, the author of Stolen Kisses, has been produced at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, Birmingham. Stolen Kisses is not remarkable either for constructive power or brilliant dialogue, but it has some humour, and two at least of its characters succeed in amusing the audience by their sayings and doings. Hence, in the dearth of dramatic talent, it has received a good-natured welcome, and this gives to the author's new play a certain importance. The title is A Daughter of Eve, and the story appears to be of a rather melodramatic kind. It does not, however, appear very clear whether "the daughter of Eve" of the title is the youthful heroine who has been wrongfully charged with petty larceny, and has weakly fled from her accusers, or the wicked Lady Glenmore, who, from motives of vengeance, permits the young lady to marry, and then overwhelms the bridegroom by betraying this compromising secret. The persecuted innocence of the play appears to resemble the unblushing iniquity which is also one of its features—at least in the fact that each is presented in its purest and most concentrated form. In the end youthful innocence is clearly established, and it has occurred to the writer, in a happy moment of inspiration, to allow the young lady to be suddenly discovered to be the long-lost daughter of the cruel but now repentant Lady Glenmore. Mr. Merritt's plots have an unwelcome resemblance to the sort of serial stories which flourish in the lower kind of cheap weekly periodicals. There is in fact a suburban taint in his pieces which must be removed before he can hope to achieve a lasting success in the theatres of the better class. Another play by this writer, and entitled The Golden Plough, is in preparation at the Adelphi.

In the course of his address to the audience on the occasion of his recent benefit at the Lyceum Theatre, Mr. Irving referred to an intention of appearing next winter in another play of Shakespeare. He is, we believe, studying the part of King Lear.

The Gaiety just now is one of the few theatres which are able not only to keep open doors, but to secure full, and even crowded, audiences. The chief attraction is Mr. Byron's burlesque, The Bohemian G'yurl, which is one of the prettiest and liveliest pieces of its kind that have been produced for a long time. There is an elaborate kind of minuet danced by Miss E. Farren and Miss Kate Vaughan in the second scene, which for grace and elegance combined can hardly have been surpassed. The Gaiety stage possesses some advantages over that of the Opera Comique, where this amusing production was brought out last year, and hence the performance is in many ways more effective. It was certainly withdrawn at the Opera Comique before its popularity was exhausted, in accordance with Mr. Hollingshead's curious custom of settling and publishing his programmes a long time in advance. This habit he is said to have acquired in early years, when fulfilling the post of editor of the Nautical and Astronomical Almanac, which, it is well known, makes its appearance only once in four years, but the explanation is supposed to be apocryphal.

One hundred actors and actresses, including many distinguished names, have issued a short, but emphatic, protest against some recent attempts to provide funds for the Dramatic College at Maybury, the affairs of which institution appear not to be in a flourishing condition. The programme of the fêtes at Lillie Bridge on behalf of the charity appears indeed to justify both the epithet "buffoonery," and the complaint of the protesting party that the proceedings tended to degrade the art which they follow, and whose best interests they are bound to protect.

The Imprisoned Detectives.——The three police inspectors and Mr. Froggatt, the solicitor, who is charged with them, were again before the Bow Street magistrate on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday last week, the whole of the time being taken up with the examination-in-chief of the convict Kurr. The witness, continuing the narrative of his alleged intercourse with the defendants, said, among other things, that soon after the discovery of the De Goncourt fraud, Druscovich met him by appointment, and, appearing to be greatly excited, told him that, now he had given him the "tip," he must look after himself, as he (Druscovich) had been "piped off"—i.e., watched. During the proceedings on Friday there was a smart and somewhat lengthy contention between Mr. Poland, the prosecuting counsel, and Mr. St. John Wontner, who appeared for Druscovich, as to the admissibility of the copy of a telegram alleged to have been sent to the witness at the Bridge of Allan, and, after Sir J. Ingham had finally decided against it, some laughter was created by Mr. Poland putting the question, "How did you know that Druscovich was coming to Edinburgh?" and Kurr's replying, "In consequence of the telegram which was objected to a moment ago." On Saturday, Kurr gave some interesting details of the attempt to bribe the police and the magistrates at Rotterdam, for which purpose the witness alleged that he gave Mr. Froggatt 50*l.* The case, which continues to excite great interest, was adjourned until to-day (Saturday), Mr. Poland not having completed his examination-in-chief.—It is said that the Government have determined to institute a searching inquiry into the entire working of the detective system, with a view to the appointment of a superior class of persons to positions of authority and responsibility.

The Artisans' Dwellings Company.——After another lengthy hearing before the Bow Street magistrate, the case against Messrs. Swindlehurst, Langley, and Saffery has been again adjourned. An extraordinary general meeting of the company was held last Friday under the presidency of the Hon. E. Ashley, chairman pro tem. of the Board of Directors. During the discussion of the report of the Investigation Committee, Mr. Hawkins, a member of the late Board, said that the directors used to sign a large number of blank cheques, which were left to the disposal of the secretary. At the last meeting of the Board, in June, no fewer than 2,500 blank cheques were signed for dividend in July, and within three days afterwards it appeared that there was no money at the bank. Mr. Baxter Langley made a speech, in which he said that he had never sought connection with the Company, and had derived no financial benefit from it whatever. He defended the system of declaring dividends out of estimated profits, which Mr. S. Morley, M.P., in a previous speech, had spoken of as being eminently unsound. The report of the Committee was adopted, and a bonus of 300*l.* was ordered to be presented to Mr. Pearce, one of the auditors, for his persevering and disinterested efforts in promoting the investigation.—It is said that Dr. Langley, who has for several years past been seeking to gain the confidence of the electors of Greenwich, has now definitively retired from his candidature for the borough.

Uncivil Drivers.——Some weeks ago the Lord Mayor of London narrowly escaped being run over by a reckless and abusive cab-driver, who, on being subsequently brought before him, was let off with a mild rebuke. His lordship, however, has no hesitation in punishing offenders of this kind when other persons complain of their misbehaviour. The other day he imposed a fine of 1*l.* and costs upon an omnibus driver for inconveniencing a gentleman by driving his horses so close to the door of another 'bus as to prevent its being opened. The Lord Mayor said that day after day he witnessed from the windows of the Mansion House some of the most aggravating cases of impertinence on the part of omnibus men and cab-drivers that it was possible to imagine. Their whole pleasure seemed to be to cause as much annoyance and pain as they possibly could. He was only too glad to see such men brought before him, and he would take care that they did not go unpunished.

Miscellaneous Items.——The trial of the three persons accused of the wilful murder of Mrs. Harriet Staunton has been postponed until September, to enable the prisoners to procure additional evidence as to the cause of death to rebut that which has been adduced on behalf of the prosecution. They are also to be tried for the manslaughter of the child of Louis Staunton.—Mr. Justice Hawkins, before whom a man was last week committed for manslaughter at the Liverpool Assizes, has since received a letter threatening his life, and telling him that his wife would be a widow within a week. On Wednesday his lordship, attired in his official robes, appeared in the witness-box at the Dale Street police station, to give evidence as to the receipt of the missive, and a youth named Quinn, who is suspected of being the writer, was committed for trial.—At Abingdon a clergyman aged seventy-six has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment for obtaining a service of Communion plate by false pretences.—Mr. John Rea, the well-known Belfast solicitor, possibly emulative of the great achievements of his compatriots in Parliament, has been trying his hand at obstruction and physical endurance at the County Antrim Assizes, where, appearing as plaintiff in an action against the ex-Mayor of Belfast, he claimed 13,000*l.* damages for an alleged assault at a public meeting. Mr. Rea of course conducted his own case, and poured forth such a flood of eloquence that at last the Chief Justice told him that he must conclude in one half-hour more. When this time had elapsed Mr. Rea was reminded of the fact, and invited to produce evidence; but he declined to do so, and might possibly have gone on speaking until now had not the Chief Justice settled the matter by discharging the jury.—The action brought against the Under-Master of Dulwich College by one of the Assistant-Masters for alleged slander and libel, has resulted in a verdict of 40*s.* damages; but judgment has not yet been given.—We have had a plentiful crop of murders this week. On Monday the dead body of a labouring man, seventy years old, was found in a market garden near Kew, where he is supposed to have been murdered the previous Saturday for the sake of his week's wages.—On Sunday morning, at Islington, an Irishman named Lynch killed his wife. The couple had been living apart, and a meeting had been arranged with a view to reconciliation. For a time their conversation was amicable; but the poor woman seems to have been afraid to go home with her husband, and this exciting his anger he suddenly drew a razor, and cut her throat.—At Liverpool Assizes sentence of death has just been passed upon a man for a most revolting murder. It appears that, having had some quarrel with his victim, he suggested to a neighbour that they should "go and soften Lloyd's —— head." The neighbour refused; but after awhile the deceased came out of his house and, being annoyed and challenged by the prisoner, struck him with his fist, drawing blood. The prisoner went into his own house, and, finding that he was bleeding, said with an oath, "Am I to lose blood and get nothing for it?" He then snatched up a poker, and, rushing to Lloyd's house, beat him about the head in such a fearful manner that be died ten days afterwards.

"UNEASY LIES THE HEAD THAT WEARS A CROWN"

FROM THE PICTURE BY J. C. DOLLMAN EXHIBITED AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY

"THE SEA OF MOUNTAINS," by Molyneux St. John (2 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—The title of this book is the name once given—much to the displeasure of a colony whose ambition is to be a great railway terminus—by a "distinguished Canadian statesman" to the province of British Columbia; its subject, Lord and Lady Dufferin's conciliatory tour among the aggrieved Columbians last year; its writer, one of the newspaper correspondents who followed in the Governor-General's train to indite "special letters" to their subscribers. The story of the quarrel between the youngest member of the new Dominion and her sisters, is, as all know, the story of a railway. Six years ago, in the heyday of Confederation, this railway was promised, and within ten years. But Canada, it might have been guessed at the time, was in no condition to undertake so promptly the construction of a railway to the Pacific coast, more particularly when the track must run among a "sea of mountains" to a terminus whose proper site is still a matter of some dispute. And gradually between the reluctance of the Canadians to be hurried into any hasty outlay, the insistance of the Vancouver's Island people on the so-called "Carnarvon Terms," the immediate construction, that is, of the last section of the railway line as originally proposed, the bit between their coal-fields of Nanaimo and their harbour of Esquimault, and the refusal of the mainland colonists to accept even this as a settlement of the dispute, negotiations between the Eastern and Western members of the Confederation had come to a somewhat embittered deadlock. It was to make things pleasant in an unofficial way, and ascertain for himself the real feeling of a colony which was beginning to talk pretty loudly of separation, that Lord Dufferin undertook last summer the tour recorded in these volumes. And much to the satisfaction of moderate men all round—for there can be no doubt that the intercolonial railway is a question not of honest intention, but of time and means—was the tour, in spite of some unpleasantnesses at the outset, commenced and carried to its close. Its details are perhaps too full of purely colonial interest to secure the undivided attention of the every-day reader; nor is the narrative quite free from the roughness natural to letters bound up, after a few excisions, much as they were sent to the Toronto Globe. Still there is a good deal both to edify and to amuse in the incidents of a tour by a real Governor-General across the States; in the description of the land-locked seas, at once perilous and beautiful, which divide Vancouver's Island from the mainland; in the accounts of the Indian tribes, in all their various degrees of savageness, between the forty-ninth parallel and the rarely-visited Queen Charlotte's Isles. The absence of a good map is perhaps the chief defect in volumes generally well-informed and lively.

A third and revised edition of that important work, "The Organ: its History and Construction" (R. Cocks and Co.)—the former by the late Dr. Rimbault; the latter by Mr. E. Hopkins, organist of the Temple—will be welcomed wherever the "king of instruments" is known and prized. St. Cecilia's self indeed might lean from Heaven to note how the "vocal frame" has grown in favour and in power, triumphing over Puritanic pride and architectural caprice, until the pipes which Cromwell's soldiers smashed in play, bidding the choristers "goe sing hot pudding pyes," the "d——'s box of whistles" for which old Wren refused to change an iota of his plans, have advanced to a dignity which makes the architect deem the organ-loft scarcely lower than the rood-screen and causes the "Kist o' whustles" to be heard in the heart of the Presbyterian sanctuary. So pleasant, indeed, is this large volume, one could almost wish it broken up into three handy sections—Dr. Rimbault for the lover of musical anecdote and history, Mr. Hopkins on construction and tuning for the technical, the appendix about great organs at home and abroad for easy reference when about to travel. Altogether one of the most generally interesting of technical works that we could name.

"Music in the House," by J. Hullah, the third number of the new "Art at Home Series" (Macmillan and Co.), though far from lacking in useful hints on choice of instruments, distinctness of enunciation, rehearsal practice, and so forth, strike us as just a thought too general and sketchy. Its strongest point—that at least which most impresses itself on the memory—is its number of suggestions for valuable additions to the amateur's repertoire from sources as a rule but lightly skimmed or altogether overlooked.

Side by side with a second edition of that excellent volume of the "British Manufacturing Industries Series" (E. Stanford), which treats of papermaking and bookbinding, of photography and toys, &c., we receive from the same publisher a new and charming little book, entitled "British Industries: Horticulture," by F. W. Burbidge. Two centuries ago, and horticulture would hardly have been bold to class itself among national industries at all. It is far short even yet of the importance it may one day assume, though employing as it does large capital, and yielding in most instances large returns. As an industry it divides itself into the culture of fruit and vegetables for the table, or of plants and flowers for decorative ends; the production of new varieties by artificial processes, and the acclimatisation of new forms imported from abroad. Though supply in its case still lags behind demand—our import of fruit alone amounts to some 6,000,000*l.* yearly—it has long since made its mark among the more enterprising of scientific industries. It pays far better than most kinds of culture—witness its extending growth in Kent and Herts; it can be applied to much that is now waste land—to the 200 square miles say of railway embankment lying idle; it keeps alive a busy train of collateral trades and industries. Though quite an enthusiast on many of these points, Mr. Burbidge never allows himself to forget that mere increase of production without a market profit is little worth. As a short survey of horticulture as a national industry the little book is almost perfect, nor does it limit itself to this alone, but adds besides some excellent notes on ornamental gardening and our public parks, and on the varieties of garden industry among our great producing rivals of America and the Continent.

For horticulture again in its most fashionable form of carpet, geometrical, and sub-tropical garden beds we have yet another tasteful little book in Mr. Nathan Cole's "The Royal Parks and Gardens of London" (Journal of Horticulture Office, Fleet Street).—Prettily got-up and fairly illustrated, to brief descriptions of our great public gardens and useful hints on the arrangement of trees and plants and combination of colours in harmonious sequence it adds quite a multitude of ingenious designs for beds and borders in all the varieties of Lobelias, Geraniums, Alteroantheras, and the like. Just possibly the taste for this mosaic work may not be so long-lived as Mr. Cole appears to think. Still while it lasts we can well commend his book as an excellent instructor.

From flowers and shrubs we pass to sternest figures in "Correspondence Relating to the Budgets of Various Countries," edited by J. W. Probyn (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin), the latest, and in some respects most interesting, of the many interesting publications of the Cobden Club. Our public burdens, which now reach nearly eighty millions, some five-and-twenty years ago rarely, as Mr. Probyn tells, exceeded at the outside fifty-two, and middle-aged taxpayers may remember further how in those halcyon days of '51 the Budget of '35 was the ideal type to which the late Mr. Cobden and his friends were ever vainly essaying to bring us back. No doubt the rise in values all round accounts for much; the greater expenditure on works that may fairly be styled productive for something more. Yet there is something still behind which quite justifies the Cobden Club in their circular inquiry of the chief nations of the world as to the means possessed by them of controlling Government expenditure and the tendency of their Legislative bodies to keep down charges or limit abuses in administration. And, sooth to say, much the same answer comes from almost all. The system of control is good, more perfect in some places than our own. The feeling about expenditure is greatly changed. The Commons now are everywhere kings, and spend the taxpayers' money as royally as any kings of old. Before 1848, says Professor Nasse of Prussia, the absolute monarchy dared not be extravagant. The popular representatives call for greater outlay now in education, &c., and the Government is sheltered against public opinion. Only, in fact, in Denmark, where a majority of peasant farmers act usually on two broad principles, the one that military expenditure is useless, the other that no official need have a larger income than one of themselves, does economy still hold her own. Still, if Budgets have increased, so have incomes, too, and if money is spent freely it brings its fair return of money's worth. On the whole, the Cobden Club has been more successful in bringing together an interesting collection of constitutional statistics than in eliciting any very decided condemnation of matters as they are.

Two volumes more—7th and 8th—of the "M.C.C. Cricket Scores and Biographies" (Longmans and Co.), bring up the record from 1860 to 1864. A volume now for every two years—the rate of progress is ominously slow, yet who that love the game would willingly curtail a register so complete of matches and of players? Among the biographies we notice those of the renowned W. G. Grace, and the only less famous Jupp, Oscroft, and A. Shaw.

The inefficiency of servants is much bemoaned nowadays, and inexperienced mistresses are sometimes at a loss to show how the work should be done. Mrs. Cupples' "Book about House Work" (Simpkin, Marshall) will prove of considerable assistance to young housekeepers, as it tells the duties of housemaid, cook, and nurse, and gives numerous hints on domestic matters.—Now that flowers are so largely utilised for decorative purposes, Mr. Saward's "Artistic Flower Decorations" (The Bazaar) will be found specially useful. Here are directions for ornamenting tables, rooms, halls, and conservatories in varied styles; the most effective and lasting flowers being mentioned.—Decorations of a less ephemeral character are described in "Artistic Amusements" (The Bazaar), which explains the processes of stencilling, china-painting, vitremanie, and a host of occupations for deft fingers and tasteful imaginations. The same publisher sends Vol. I. of "Foreign Cage Birds," by C. W. Gedney—a plain, sensible work on the parrot tribe, containing simple information based upon actual experience.—By the aid of "Character Indicated by Handwriting," by R. Baughan (The Bazaar), curious people may dissect their dear friends' letters, and discover their good and bad points. The author well supports the theory that caligraphy furnishes a correct estimate of character, and gives numerous fac-similes of autographs of celebrities as illustrations. The various formations of different letters are each shown to denote some distinctive quality.

A BATH IN THE BLACK FOREST

WE will suppose, indulgent reader, that in the course of your travelling experience but little has escaped your observant eye, that the bye-paths and rarely-visited nooks of the European Continent are as familiar to you as the beaten highway;—but it is nevertheless possible that your investigating glance may not have penetrated every corner, and it is precisely one of these "remote" but not "unfriendly" spots that we propose introducing to your notice. If it be hitherto unknown to you, our guarantee that you might go farther and fare worse may perhaps tempt you thither; if you know it already, you will scarcely be disposed to hide your face, as the physician did on passing a church-yard, excusing himself by saying that it contained some old acquaintances he was by no means anxious to renew. At any rate, you remember Appenweier, the station between Strasburg and Oos, from which branches off the line at Basle; you have stopped their often enough on your way to lose your money at Baden—you see, we are initated into some of your little secrets, but don't be alarmed, it shan't go any farther; well, on leaving the train and entering the restaurant (where you can't do better than regale yourself on the standard dish, Kalbscoteletten), you will find, if you arrive at the nick of time, a strange-looking vehicle at the door, half omnibus, half diligence, the driver of which will vow by all the saints in the (German) calendar to deposit you safe and sound at your journey's end in a couple of hours, and what is more, he will keep his word. But, you naturally ask, where is our journey's end? Gentle sir, it is Griesbach, in the Forêt Noire; so take your place beside the schwager, light your cigar, and en route!

Our road leads us alternately up and down hill, the former predominating; one wooded eminence succeeds another, with here and there a stray village, every cottage in which displays some half-a-dozen oleanders in full bloom. Presently our conductor pulls up at a wayside inn, and tells us confidentially that the best Kirschenwasser in the Duchy is made there, recommending us to carry off a bottle or two with us, which, after having tried and approved it, we do. Jehu, who has of course come in for his share, cracks his whip with renewed vigour, and in three-quarters of an hour we arrive at Petersthal, an opposition bathing establishment consisting of one spacious pension in a sort of square, flanked by a few scattered dwellings, apparently serving as accessory lodging-houses to the main edifice. Onward we rattle for another half hour, and after breasting a stiffish hill, and turning abruptly round a corner, come in sight of an irregular mass of buildings, evidently erected at various periods, and forming one complete but slightly inharmonious whole. "Da sind wir!" says our driver, as our vehicle stops before the entrance door, where a remarkably stout landlord and his acolytes, all in a row like the four-and-twenty blackbirds, are awaiting our arrival.

The presiding genius of Griesbach was in our time, and for all we know to the contrary still is, a certain Herr Jockerst, as satisfactory a specimen of an autocrat as could well be imagined, dispensing his hospitality with infinite amiability, and exercising a mild and beneficent rule over the occupants of the half score huts adjoining his domain. For it may be distinctly stated that the pension Jockerst is Griesbach, the neighbouring hamlet, including a small public house, the staple commodity of which is an indigenous beer of so innocuous a tendency that even Sir Wilfrid Lawson could hardly object to it, being mere tributaries to the Bad-Anstalt; and this once premised, let us indulge in a glance at the surrounding locality.

One of the peculiar charms of Griesbach is its isolated position; forming as it does, together with the analogous establishments at Petersthal and Rippoldsau, a species of triangle, it stands, within the limits separating it from either of them, absolutely alone. Almost wholly encircled by densely wooded hills, accessible by means of winding paths, one of which, followed to the summit, descends gradually on the other side to the valley of Rippoldsau, it presents as complete an image of seclusion as the most misanthropical hermit could desire; but with all this, the aspect of the place is neither gloomy nor suggestive of ennui. Few resorts of the kind are better patronised; the purity of the air, the medicinal virtues of the springs, and, though last not least, the exceptional moderate tariff, attract thither full as many guests from Carlsruhe, Stuttgart, Heidelberg, and Strasburg as the host can comfortably accommodate; and during the short summer season it is nearly as difficult to secure a pigeon hole in the shape of a bedroom, as for an unprivileged candidate to escape a "pilling" at the Marlborough or the Turf Club. Besides what Mrs. Blimber calls "the dominions of the drowsy god," a spacious hall is at the disposal of the visitors, serving indiscriminately as dining and drawing-room; and there, after the evening meal, the six or seven fiddlers attached to the Anstalt (and duly charged for in the weekly bills) discourse doleful music, or, if the company be unusually sprightly, strike up a waltz as a signal for the disciples of St. Vitus to spoil their digestions immediately on the removal of the supper table. It may be added that on these occasions, the lady pensionnaires being generally in a majority of at least four to one, the waiters, in the absence of more eligible partners, are frequently pressed into the service; so that it is no uncommon thing to see the identical individual, who an hour before has been handing round the Rehbraten, capering about with a self-satisfied smirk, or solemnly standing vis-à-vis to some middle-aged dame, who has laid aside her eternal knitting for the purpose of figuring in a quadrille.

But all is primitive and sans façon at Griesbach; the nearest approach to gambling is a backgammon board, and by ten o'clock the great hall is deserted, and its former occupants are in the land of dreams. What with early rising, the prescribed medical routine, and a stroll in the neatly laid-out garden behind the house, or excursions in the neighbouring woods, time passes pleasantly enough, and the simple but abundant fare provided by the worthy Herr Jockerst is done ample justice to. Whether the appetite of the guests be stimulated by the daily absorption of the waters or not, we are unable personally to say; for, although we have a firm conviction that they (the waters, not the guests), are a sovereign remedy for all the ills that human flesh is heir to, yet to our shame and confusion be it acknowledged—we quite forgot to taste them! C. H.

"GRANDFATHER'S DARLING"

WE have here a quaint and picturesque home-scene taken at Vottendam, a little fishing village on the Zuyder Zee; the interior of a fisherman's cottage with its cupboard-bed, black oaken chest, and tiled fireplace. Its walls are covered with those Delft plates, pots, pictures, and burnished metal utensils which Dutchmen so revel in, while a shrine and crucifix indicate the religion of the occupants. The old grandfather is down upon his knees before his darling, from whom he has just snatched the wooden horse and basket carriage, which lies overturned by his side with poor dolly, its only passenger, lying prostrate on the floor. The child, half-pleased and half-offended, crouches closely into her corner, keeping a wary eye upon the movements of the bespectacled marauder who has annexed her toys in so unceremonious a fashion, a liberty which would doubtless have called forth a flood of tears, were it not that she recognises him as an old playmate. The grandmother, busy by the fireside burnishing a pan, looks on with divided interest, whilst the young mother plying her knitting-needles appears to be utterly regardless of the scene. Her thoughts, perchance, are with the father far away amid the stormy dangers of the North Sea.—Our engraving is from the picture by Mr. J. Wallis Wilson, and is exhibited at the Institute of Painters in Water Colours.

SWAN-UPPING ON THE THAMES

THE privilege of keeping swans upon the River Thames has always been very jealously guarded. As early as the time of Henry VI. it was ordained that any one stealing a swan's egg should be punished with a year's imprisonment, besides being fined at the King's will, and still heavier penalties were inflicted for stealing, soaring, or driving the swans themselves. In Henry VIII.'s time all swan-herds were appointed by Royal licence, and were not allowed to mark a bird except in the presence of the King's swan-herd or his deputy. When the swan made its nest on the bank of the river instead of on an island in the stream, one of the young birds was always given to the owner of the soil in order to induce him to protect the nest. The principal owners of swans upon the Thames at the present time are Her Majesty the Queen, the Dyers' and Vintners' Companies of the City of London, and the authorities of Eton College.

The ancient custom of "upping" or marking, which forms the subject of our engraving, is still continued every year, commencing on the first Monday in August and lasting for four days, the remaining two days of the week being devoted to feasting and rejoicing. The birds are very strong and active, and it require courage as well as activity and perseverance to effect their capture. All the cygnets of the year receive the mark found on the old birds in whose company they swim, and if the parent birds are found to belong to different owners the brood of cygnets is equally divided. These marks are made by cutting across the upper part of the bill, and the pinion-leaders are also severed to prevent the birds taking flight when they reach maturity. After a time if the marks become indistinct they are deepened by the swan-herds. At one period the Vintners' Company possessed more than 500 swans, but the number is now much less, as, since they have ceased to be served up at great banquets their value has greatly declined.

CAMPING OUT

On many a night during my stay in Australia I have had the sky for my bed-curtains; and could any one wish for a more glorious canopy than the star-sown heaven of the far-off South? Unless it rain, the "homeless tramp" scarce need be pitied there. With a fire, and a rug, and saddle-flaps for pillow, the camped-out horseman can be luxurious upon the coldest night; and for a great part of the year in New South Wales the climate is so mild that a pedestrian can lie down in the Bush whenever he feels tired, and sleep with the sky for his counterpane as well as his curtains without receiving any injury. At any rate, I never took any harm, and I have often so camped out.

That last roadside tavern looked tempting after one's lonely tramp along the rough, red, dusty "road" littered with grey logs, bristling here and there with black, jagged, decayed-tooth-like stumps, and running between sombre scrub breathing forth beneath the blazing sun a somewhat somniferous aroma, and tall white-and-grey-boled, scant-shadow-casting gum trees spreading right and left apparently for ever and ever. Now and again a flock of parrots flashed screaming athwart the sunshine, and then, save when locusts chanced to be making their deafening clatter—just such as you hear when you pass iron shipyards—or where there were enough insects to raise a low, scarce audible hum, all was hushed once more. Not a leaf wagged in the hot, still, clear air: the Bush basked in trance.

But round the inn there spread an open little flat. Its grass was coarse, and sparse, and parched, but it faintly suggested an English village green. One's breath came more freely there. The mesmerising influence of the invisibly steaming scrub was gone—those walls of sundered sea-like bush stood further apart; over the hollowed tree-trunk, which served for a water-trough, there hung a very English-looking sign. Its emblazonment smacked of the soil, "The Currency Lass," but the name beneath it was genuine English, carrying one's thoughts away across the sea to whispering woods in green undulating Gloucestershire or Somerset. Very un-English was the patch of prickly pear, and hacked, notched, initial-scored, American aloes, which bounded the trough on one side, and the standard peach-tree spreading its boughs, and the luxuriant pumpkin-vine sprawling its broad leaves over the glittering shingles of the low roof, had also a colonial look; the lithe, almost lanky, young fellow in weather-bronzed cabbage-tree hat adorned with streamers of rusty-black ribbon, blue jumper, and parti-coloured moleskin trousers, who was chatting and larking with the inn family, the long lash of his stock-whip coiled like a snake around his arm, and his horse, with a blanket strapped in front of the saddle, rattling its reins against the verandah post to which it was hung up, did not look very much like a young English farmer; but bulky Boniface, buxom wife, and blooming daughters, with roses still unwithered, were British to the backbone—to reach Boniface's a vast deal more of flesh would have had to be penetrated than in the case of the Cornstalk. The long, low, white weather-board building, with its little wing-like side-rooms projecting flush with the front of the verandah, was not much like an English roadside inn either; but its occupants made the stranger feel quite at home as they rattled about him their v's for f's, and z's for s's; they drew for him a tankard of English beer, and grieved because they could not place before him English beef. Colonial ale would not have been acceptable, but, barring a little toughness, the meat was well enough, especially to a hungry man. Then, after dinner, there came the dreamy smoke in tilted rocking-chair, and resting weary legs on the bottom of the open window-frame, listening to the pleasant West-country voices and the familiar clucking, crowing, quacking, cackling of barnyard poultry, ducks, and geese, one felt strongly tempted to sigh languidly with the lotus-eaters, "We will not wander more." But a good bit more ground must be covered before sun-down, and so again one took the lonely road.

Two Chinamen have been passed, in blue loose shirts and baggy drawers, with their pig-tails docked or curled up like a woman's back hair beneath the eaves of their beehive hats, carrying their bundles of "swag" slung on bamboo poles balanced upon their shoulders, and a dray slowly grinding on, with pots and pannikins jingling beneath the axle-tree, and anon a sulky bullock lying down, and refusing to rise, flog and swear the driver never so fiercely. Big boil-like ant-hills have given way beneath one's tread, and avenging ants swarmed up inside one's trousers. Basking black snakes have wriggled out of the way; a wasted iguana has noiselessly climbed a tree, and, putting out its hideous head on one side of the hole, surveyed the passer-by with weird eyes that look wearily old enough to have beheld live pterodactyles. Out of a crumbling red-brick police barrack, built in the old convict times, and garrisoned with two drowsy troopers, pipe in mouth, nodding to their knees, and out of the tub in which he was being washed by his mother therein, has rushed, pursued by his mother, a chubby, naked little Cupid, from whose ringlets many dowsings have not been able to take the curl, and clenching dimpled fists, has shouted opprobrious epithets at the inoffensive stranger without his gates.

Now a red cloud of dust, slowly moving in the distance over the tree-tops, tells that a flock is gradually shutting up like a fan, and slowly returning to the hurdles before its slouching, blue-bloused shepherd—himself considered a "sheep" and "crawler" by the dashing stockmen of his acquaintance, who ride as if they were the human halves of centaurs, and make the mountains echo with the cracking of their stockwhips. Flecking the blue sky with white, a flock of cockatoos come screaming to their roosting-tree, circle around it, drop upon it, and in an instant the dark branches seem to have burst forth in big snowy blossom. The laughing jackasses startle the stillness of the bush with their weirdly drunken hilarity as the sun goes down. The light fades out of the sky, darkness seems to steam upwards from the ground. The air, so still by day, wakes after sun-down, and sends an uncanny shiver through the drooping fibres of the shea oak. Spotted native cats have come abroad to prowl—flying foxes are dropping down on their dusky wings like cherubim which kept not their first estate. Opossums can be heard chattering and racing back when scared to their lofty holes in the gum trees. Huge moths flutter about on noiseless wing, pursued by night-jars as silent—until from their gulf-like gaping mouths there issues a cry of "More pork" instead of "Moth." A hoarse croak comes nearer and nearer, and then stalks past en route for water a Nankeen crane, which looks ghost-like in the gloom. A little off the track blinks sullenly the red fire of some camped-out travellers, whose horses are shuffling and hopping about in hobbles. It looks tempting, but the travellers are asleep, and might possibly shoot at sight any one who roused them from their slumbers, and inquire who he was afterwards.

Farther on there is a roofless hut, which seems as good a sleeping place as one could find, were it not for a frog which croaks on the deserted hearthstone, like a spirit telling of the dark deed which caused the hearth to be deserted. A little further on still, and one stretches onesself on the ground beneath the Southern Cross and the Magellan clouds which look like smudges of golden down which some archangel's brushing wing has left upon the sky. A curlew is wailing most despairingly some quarter of a mile off, but a weary man's ears soon close to the dolefullest of sounds. The chilliness of the air, however, awakes him some three hours afterwards, and constrains him to get up and walk about. The moon has risen, silvering the bronze bush. A little reach of unshaded creek down below glitters almost dazzlingly. How lonely it looks, but doubtless watermoles are disporting themselves on it, or in their burrows in its banks, in their quaintly solemn fashion. Hawthorne's Puritan children, who played at going to church, were not more gravely amused and amusing. Far off a range of mountains—spectre mountains—fringes a segment of the sky. The wanderer turns in, or rather down, again, and sleeps the sleep of the still weary, until long after sunrise.

When he wakes in the warm sunshine up he gets and shakes his lugs, like Burns's dogs at night, and feels as blithe as the saucy, glossy magpies and crows musically fluting and croaking about the fallen grey branches glistening like frosted silver in the glorious light, and the pretty little twitting grey, white, black, and yellow diamond sparrows, with drops of red sealing-wax on their wings, popping in and out of the aromatic scrub.

He feels also very hungry, and regards with some envy the frying-pan full of frizzling mutton chops which the woman in the bark-roofed hut he passes has just taken off the fire for the refection of her brood of white-haired young ravens. However, down below there is a little township of green-embowered grey and white houses, with a Macquarie Arms, which will supply his wants, and when he has there broken his fast, and had a bracing dip in the shaded bend of the sparkling creek, he will go on his way rejoicing, prepared for another, for half-a-dozen more nights of Camping Out.

THE COMMONEST THING IN THE WORLD

Nothing affords so comfortable a seat when tired of walking down a country lane as a log of timber lying on the sward under the shadow of tall elms, lit up with the red glow of the sinking sun whose beams shine level over the fields,

> Where the poppy plants his banner
> Scarlet bright amid the corn.

The wayside weeds are trying to hide the flint-heap near by, the tiny wild pink geraniums, and the larger blue crane's bill, and the creeping tendrils of the convolvulus have lovingly nestled up against the hard stones, fringing them with beauty. The flowers do not disdain the flints even, so in the idleness of the moment let us pick one up; a rough, sharp-edged flint, common, despicable, yet the whole history of the human race lies now in the hollow of the hand.

When the noble sun yonder was—ah, how many thousands of years younger, there stole stealthily through the primæval forests an all-but nude animal, fighting, struggling daily for bare existence with the huge beasts of the earth, hiding in caves fearfully, wondering at the darkness and the dawn, hailing the sun there as a god, yet walking upright, and already pondering deeply in a dim way—in brief, a man with the divine spark of intellect in his brain. His naked foot stepped on a flint whose sharp edge cut it; a beast of the forest would have simply rushed from the spot in anger and pain, but the man stooped down and picked it up, just as we have done, looked at it, turned it over in the hollow of his hand, till an idea occurred to him. What had cut him would cut anything else—he tried it on a branch, and marked and gashed the bark. It would cut deeper if it was thinner; he dashed it against a larger stone, and it split up into flakes. There was the first knife, there was the germ of progress, the tool which gave him dominion over the beasts of the field, and even the elements themselves. With the flint-flake the rude club torn from a tree could be fashioned into shape; such a flake attached to the end of a long stick formed a javelin with which game could be dexterously transfixed at some little distance. A larger and heavier piece made a spear for close attack; a smaller, an arrow-head, when the bow at once became a powerful weapon. Knives of the same material cut up the animal the hunter had killed, and with flint scrapers the skin was cleaned and prepared for use as dress, or the sinews for string and thread. The peculiarity of flint is that if tapped in a particular manner it chips off, or splits almost to a nicety in proportion to the strength and direction of the blow. Thus primitive man was able to make spear-heads and arrowheads, knives, and so on of really exquisite workmanship and artistic shape. It answered admirably for cutting or stabbing; but would not stand the jar of chopping; hence axes were generally ground of stone with a grain that did not readily split into laminæ. But when the tree had been laboriously felled with such dull tools, the sharp flint knives or chisels hollowed it out into the canoe, and shaped the paddles. Here already was dominion over the beasts, and over the element of water. With these knives wood could be fashioned into the fire-drill for the obtaining of heat by friction, and so fire.

Still higher yet. The keen edge of the flint flake carved out lines and designs upon the paddles and sides of the canoes, on the posts which supported the hut, and on the handles of the weapons and tools themselves. Such horn handles cunningly cut out into the likeness of couchant animals still exist; and yet more. On a famous piece of ivory there may be seen the outline sketch, if one may so call it, of the mammoth—that prehistoric monster—graven probably with a flint-tool, and not without spirit. Here was Art. Then came rude images of the gods—idols sculptured with the flint, and certain ceremonies of a religious character performed by such an instrument. Some have thought that even the advanced Egyptians chiselled out their statues with flint, since copper tools could not touch such hard material; and did not Zipporah circumcise her son with a "sharp stone," i.e., a flint? It is known that sacrifices were cut up with flint knives. The spear, the javelin, and the arrow-head of flint made something like an organised army possible, and hence war and conquest, and the migrations of tribes and races of men ages and ages since. Thus, the chase, war, art, and religion itself owed almost everything to the discovery of the flint. From it sprang civilisation. He was a genius indeed who first used the flint-flake; and note this, no monkey—though the monkey tribe has existed for ages and ages and ages—has ever advanced to such intelligence. The line is distinctly marked between the first man, however rude, of whom caves bear record, and the cleverest ape or monkey. The most primitive of men used a tool: there it is.

From the distant East—India—to the distant West—America, all along the vast caravan route, so to say, of the human race, from the sunrise to sunset, in cave, and mound, and river, the chipped flint is found, the hieroglyphic of man; the stamp, as it were, of his presence. Ay, and even at the bottom of the sea. Off the eastern coast of England the trawl and dredger now and then at intervals brings up to the surface from the silence of the deep—miles and miles out at sea—just such tools and weapons, adding to the accumulated evidence of the enormous changes which have taken place since the Stone peoples hunted over what is now the home of the mackerel, since this island was part of a continent. What a history has yet to be written of those strange times! The chapters are being slowly spelt out word by word, in caves, in tumuli, by stones and flints, and shell mounds, and carved horn and ivory; just as the cuneiform inscriptions were deciphered by patient ingenuity.

Later down, the flint won the battle of Waterloo in the flint-lock guns of our gallant soldiers; and to this day glass of the finest quality is manufactured by its aid, and with glass lenses and prisms the mystery of the stars was solved. Give this round flint a smart tap; see: as it cracks open, the centre is hollow—there is a little dusty substance in the concavity: men of science say it is the remains of a sponge (sponge-spiculæ) which once flourished in the ocean till the liquid silex poured round and enveloped it, destroying yet preserving. This large and shapeless block is full of crystals, which glitter in the sun at first, but soon grow dull after exposure to the atmosphere. Here, on another, see what exactly resembles the outline tracing of a delicate fern, as if a fern had been stamped into the stone; some consider it an effect of what for convenience sake we may call crystallisation, any way it is beautiful. Our forefathers, in their powdered wigs and gaiters, and silver kneebuckles, and rapiers, lit their candles by the aid of flint and steel for long, long generations.

But pause—a solitary star, it is Arcturus, which Job the great poet watched and wrote of in the old-world days, shines down through the elm branches, and the bats are wheeling in mazy circles round the trees. It is time to go. The flint, dropped from the hand on the sward, rolls out into the road, to be crushed with all its marvellous history under the careless wheel of the thoughtless carter, ground into powder, to the last serving man by mending his highway.

LOCAL MUSEUMS AND GALLERIES

In a remarkable book—the most remarkable in its way since "Ecce Homo," we mean Dr. Abbott's "Through Nature up to Christ," we are assured that when Christianity is properly developed "private galleries will be few; public galleries, museums, &c., will be attached to every church in every hamlet; Art will be fittingly encouraged; the 'Light of the World' and such-like masterpieces will not be hawked about the country by speculative exhibitors, but will flow at once to some church as to their natural resting-place." This is sufficiently Utopian, and perhaps not altogether desirable, for when something of the kind was going on in Italy the accompanying development of Christianity was not such as to make us wish for its reproduction. One thing, however, is certain; in these days of increased centralisation the extremities of our island suffer more and more in regard to art-culture. How is an art-student in Cornwall or Cumberland, to say nothing of Caithness or Mayo, to get sight even of one or two decent pictures, old or modern, at a time when, to form his taste, he ought to be carefully studying several pictures from several schools?

Genius will come to the front in spite of obstacles; Morland and "Old Crome" sufficiently prove this; but, if we had more local galleries, our English exhibitions would not be so full of portraits and genre pictures, we should add to native excellence that culture and breadth in which the French so far excel us. We have had our local "schools"—one a generation or two ago at Bristol, one now at Plymouth, but they have worked under great disadvantages; mostly they have only been "schools" by courtesy, imitating the manners of one not very first-rate individual. They are not to be blamed; how could men catch the spirit of those whose works they never saw till their own style was more or less formed? And they have done enough to convince any Government or Corporation of the desirableness of opening Art-galleries in local centres where originals may be "loaned" and good copies permanently exhibited. The case of sculpture is easily settled, for a really good cast is for learners as good as the original, and good casts may be cheaply and indefinitely multiplied. In painting, too, we don't take enough account of the copyist's work. There are copies and copies; that copy, for instance, in the Antwerp Museum of Van Eyck's "Adoration of the Lamb," was the loving work of years, and is not too unworthy to be set side by side with the original. If there was a demand no doubt really good copyists would be forthcoming, as they are in Italy. A painter who had risen to fame would often send to his native town a careful copy of one of the masterpieces that he loved, if only the town had a fitting place where to bestow such a gift. It is a disgrace that there should be towns of a quarter of a million of inhabitants without a single picture freely open to the public, except perhaps a portrait of the late mayor in his robes, and, it may be, a full-length of one of the numerous Royal family of the last century. It is almost as bad with museums, as the life of Edward, the shoemaker-naturalist, has lately reminded us; but museums, if they are to do much work, need the adjuncts of lectures and libraries, Art-galleries feed the eye, and it is by judiciously feeding the eye that the future painter receives his earliest development.

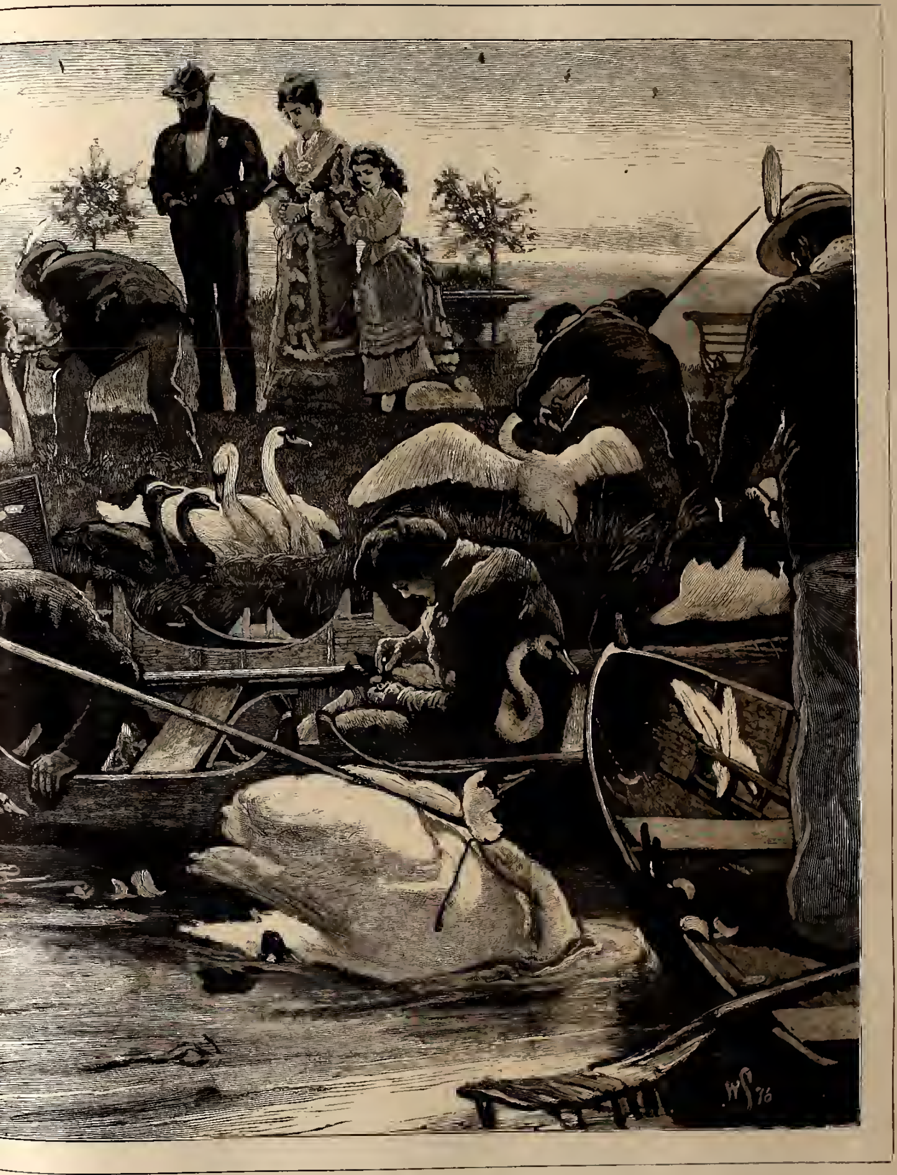
SWAN-UPPING ON THE



THAMES ABOVE WINDSOR

Magazines

Much the most striking article in the Nineteenth Century is Mr. Gladstone's swift reply to Mr. Dicey's plea in the earlier pages of the number for an occupation of Egypt on the plausible ground of opportuneness. Nothing, in effect, says Mr. Dicey, can just now be easier—an ironclad at Port Said, a few British troops at Alexandria, a present of half the tribute (capitalised) to the needy Sultan, a Resident at Cairo, or better still an administrator to take the real weight of Government, without changing its machinery, from the willing shoulders of the Khedive, and the work is done to the contentment of everybody—even, with a little management, of France. To all this Mr. Gladstone replies that the supposed necessity for taking Egypt at all rests solely on an exaggerated view of the military importance of the Canal; that the occupation of a country virtually stretching to the Equator could never stop at the cheap and easy garrisoning of a few points in Lower Egypt; that such a measure could not, in fact, but add one terrible burden more to those which always weigh upon a nation of 30,000,000, with 300,000,000 of subjects and dependents. Are not our men, he asks, too few for this? Or even, as a point of honour, is it right while the Sick Man still lives to hurry on the partition of his inheritance?—A keen yet kindly critique of Harriet Martineau, by W. R. Greg, brings into vivid light her great intellectual defect, the tendency to hasty judgments. "Doubt seems to have been a state of mind unknown to her. She never reconsidered her opinions or mused over her judgments." Nor was it otherwise with impressions gleaned from others. "If you spoke to her of men or things before she had formed any judgment of either, you usually found little difficulty in writing your impressions on her mind; but if you were a day too late it was almost hopeless to effect a change."—Amongst other articles the ablest to our mind is Mr. G. J. Holyoake's "Impatience in Politics," an acute and subtly-reasoned analysis of the moral causes of the present Liberal collapse.—Continuations of Mr. Froude's study of "Thomas Becket," of Mr. Brassey's "Round the World in the Sunbeam," with other contributions no less readable—foremost the Laureate's sounding verses, a little shaky perhaps here and there as a translation, on "Achilles over the Trench"—make up a number of fair, though hardly of exceptional excellence.

But two, or at the utmost three, of the eight papers in the grave Contemporary fall quite outside the category of "learned," and of these three we give the palm to Dr. A. M. Gray's "Neglected Aspects of the Drink Question," one of the most outspoken protests we have had for months against the vain assumption that "Rough's Alley" will grow virtuous if you cut off its beer and gin, and the middle-class suburb begin the downward path if once it yield to XX or deceitful claret. Alley and suburb are sketched side by side with rough and vigorous colours from the life, and the required moral drawn with the most uncompromising directness.—A rarely-trodden path in Scriptural criticism is opened up by Mr. A. Taylor Innes in his examination of the "Trial of Christ" before the Council by the cold light of legal precedent and strict conformity with the rules and principles of Hebrew law. Mr. Innes seems to prove conclusively that in its most important points it had "neither the form nor the fairness of a judicial process," though none the less did it express most truly "the nation's rejection of the Saviour's claim."—Mrs. Pattison has quite a brilliant paper, destined, we learn elsewhere, to appear one day as the preface to a larger work—on the short-lived radiance of the French Renaissance; and Mr. Stuart, under the title of "Tuileries and Vatican," a clever chapter, a little overcrowded with names and facts, on the dextrous policy by which the Curia, from the days of Cardinal Gonsalvi downwards, has used by turn, to its own ends, Restored Bourbon, Citizen King, and Third Napoleon, and now endeavours so to use MacMahon and his entourage.—Mr. Freeman, too, is fierce and bitter on Holmes and Hobart and the Turkophiles of the press; and Mr. Curzon amusing, if not very novel, on the "Horse as an Instrument of Gambling."

"Sea or Mountain?" by Dr. Burney Yeo, should sell of itself a round thousand of the Fortnightly, for is not this the very question which each malade imaginaire is just now asking himself, and can there be this month a nicer study than to pause over Bradshaw to decide whether by Professor Beneke's experiments on the processes of tissue-change at the sea-level and on mountain tops, yours is the organisation to be sent off to the Engadine or to the ocean waves of Scarborough or Biarritz? Then besides this is Mr. Wallace's good paper on "Secret Societies in Russia," including, of course, the dreaded Nihilists; and Mr. Grant Duff as paterfamilias, with his "plea for rational education," for an education, that is to say, which can turn "sensible, cleverish boys" into neither Philistines nor Barbarians, but fairly accomplished gentlemen—Mr. Grant Duff's sixteen heads of fair accomplishments are too numerous to quote—of the age of twenty-one or twenty-two. Or if even this is not enough, is there not still the editor's dark but able study of the Atheistic materialism of Holbach?

Blackwood has little this month of special interest. "Pauline" is growing rather stupid, and, what is worse, like something we have read before.—"Mine is Thine" has hardly got into its stride.—A fair paper on Victor Hugo and one on "Our Indian Frontier Policy," eulogistic in the extreme of Lord Lytton's action in Khelat, make up, with the usual month's survey of the "Storm in the East," a passable number, and no more.

In the Cornhill the single papers leave far behind the serial stories, despite the passing interest one must feel in heroines who talk or write like this:—"Our art was with finger, and nail, and eye to rime into every jot of it." "Amalfi, Pæstum, Capri," by J. A. S., is a picture bright with gorgeous colours; "Royal and Noble Gossip," a fair collection of ana not too generally known; "François Villon, Student, Poet, and Housebreaker," a capital sketch, after M. Longnon, of the cleverest scamp of pre-Renaissance France, a scamp, too, we fear, of those to whose malign influence it was mainly due that the rich seed of the Renaissance and the Reformation fell in France on a cold and barren soil, and brought no fruit to perfection.

Fraser has quite an exceptional number of articles of interest. In "The City," a review by Mr. Arthur Arnold of Mr. Gilbert's recent work, we find that gentleman in part the champion of the City against Mr. Gilbert's sæva indignatio. Let but the area of administration and endowment be extended, he seems to say, to that Greater London from which the City proper should never have shrunk back, the useless multitude of small doles be swept away, the excessive feasting of Livery Companies and Committees thoroughly retrenched, and there is no reason why Companies and Corporation should not long remain more powerful and popular than ever. It must be owned, however, that retrenchment cannot well begin too soon, when one Company alone spends 30,000*l.* yearly on its dinners and 175*l.* on the encouragement of skill in its own craft.—In "Sexagenarian Mountaineering" Mr. Barham Zincke tells the tale of some pleasant climbs, too arduous, we fear, for most sexagenarians, among the passes south-east of Mont Blanc; while Madame Jessie White Mario brings her "Experience of Ambulances" down to Monte Rotondo and Mentana.—"British Trade" treats of the ill-omened names of the "Plate, Chili, and Peru;" and an "Eye-Witness" gives his version of the Annexation of the Transvaal.

Small handy vessels armoured or unarmoured for the work of rams and inclined armour plates to keep out shot are among the suggestions in Mr. Brassey's Macmillan article on "Recent Designs for Ships of War."—In the same number Professor Goldwin Smith foresees the day when Party Government will cease to be, and administration be carried on by a Council chosen for special fitness from either side of the Legislature indifferently.

A curious antiquarian fragment—George Ossolinski's Mission to England in 1621 to get help in men and money against the Turks—is the chief feature in our Catholic contemporary, the Month. How nearly he succeeded is scarcely known, for but a month or two after his arrival the victory and peace of Chokim had relieved Poland from all further danger and procured his recall. His quaint diary and later history are well worth reading.

Some caustic censures on the Academy in the Gentleman's are well backed up by a capital account of the Sicilian Mafia from the pen of T. A. Trollope, and an amusing paper on "Regimental Distinctions" (in the cavalry so far), by W. W. Knollys. The other papers, too, are all on interesting and well-chosen subjects.

Our old friend, the Atlantic Monthly, is hardly perhaps this month so racy of the soil as usual. "How Capt. Ascott Floored the Ghost," a lively little story of a genuine American coquette; and Mr. Perry's "German Influence in English Literature," will both repay perusal.

Stories and novelettes in every shape maintain almost exclusive possession of Belgravia and Temple Bar. A very pleasant paper by Mr. Proctor on some astronomical paradoxes forms, however, a useful set-off to the unvaried lightness of the former; a memoir of that once popular novelist, Sheridan Le Fanu, a very readable paper in the latter. We wonder though why in enumerating the late Mr. Le Fanu's lesser writings the author should have quite left out "The Watcher," the weirdest tale of the supernatural since magazines first came into being.

"LOOK TO YOUR NOSE"

This is a very common expression, but there is more in it than at first meets the eye. Noseology is a neglected science. Phrenology has had its day and generation. The science of the cranium is now as a tale that was told, although its votaries thirty years ago were quite as numerous and enthusiastically indiscriminate as the frequenters of skating-rinks and spelling-bees were a couple of years ago. Phrenology, or the theory thereof, has many salient points about it, but it lacks the determinate quality. There are so many bumps upon the head, they are defined to a hair's-breadth—according to the stucco casts that invaded nearly every house a quarter of a century ago—that really one might be self-conceited or firm, venerative or pugilistic, accordingly as a slight accident may have befallen the subject immediately before the time that he happened to come under the hands of the manipulator. Noseology is by no means so empirical. It goes directly to the point. Its professors challenge contradiction, not upon what the recognised Dictionary of the Spelling Bees has it about phrenology: "The science of the human mind as connected with the supposed organs of thought and passion in the brain, and as developed by the external undulations of the cranium;" it presumes only upon one medium organ for the reading of character, and that is the nose alone. There is at least simplification in this neglected rough-and-ready method of discerning character, and certainly quite as much accuracy as any of our clever craniologists ever exhibited.

Dr. Watts wrote—

The mind's the standard of the man.

Noseologists have a different idea. Their great apostle, Mr. Sloane, thought that the nose is the true needle to point to the loadstone of heart and mind alike. It is the most prominent outcome of the inner nature. It attaches to itself all the mental superiority of the human cosmogony.

The varieties of noses are legion—the shades of difference are multifarious, even in noses with a like general outline. These differences are perceptible, yet in many cases so faintly so that one would almost need to go into logarithms to estimate precisely. The contour of the face affects noses greatly, and a like pattern of nose on a fair man presents a difference of appearance upon a dark, and on fair and dark alike the weather, worry, or sickness makes a wonderful alteration. Into the minutiæ of noses, however, there is little need to enter, as most observers can take stock of them after a description of the four generic types. As the study progresses the types can be divided and sub-divided according to the keenness of the observation of the reader. The generic order of noses is here put thus:—

1. The Pug.
2. The Roman.
3. The Grecian.
4. The Grecian, or Composite Order.

The pug nose, pur et simple, it will readily be admitted by all—except perhaps its possessor—is by no means an attractive feature in the face, especially if the upward curve starts about a third of the distance from whence the organ is eliminated from the forehead. There are pug noses, especially in Irishmen, if not too much elevated skyward, which are not without humour if they happen to be set off with twinkling blue or light grey eyes; but if the "diamonds" at each side are not expressive the pug nose is almost next to repulsive. As a rule from a pug nose supplementary to an opaque face the writer instinctively recoils. The owner of the common pug is seldom a brilliant individual, but if he happens to possess talents it may almost be accepted as an axiom that he is overbearing. Not unfrequently he is laborious, anxious to learn, but rarely can get further than an inconsequential sneer. The common pug has something like the ferocity of the bull-dog about it, with the vacillating nature of the pug in the canine species. The owner of the uncommon pug by no means bears so bad a character. There is something more intellectual about him, although it is said by noseologists that he is a combination between a prizefighter and a drunken politician, and it would go against the grain to declare that "no one with an uncommon pug nose could be either a sculptor, a poet, or a painter." Recent history has told us very differently.

The common Roman nose is held in little repute by those who are attempting to revive this unhappily neglected science of noseology. From the bridge it is rounded off to the tip. If not strongly marked after the fashion of the late Iron Duke, the mind is not of the highest order, it barely rises above mediocrity (the man owner of the nose, it should be understood), and bedizens itself on breast and fingers with gaudy jewels. The uncommon Roman nose is altogether of a different calibre. There is a something about it which must assert itself if culture has been added to the proboscis. It is a kind of nose which overcomes all opposition, which have enabled men to conquer mortal achievements—"to mould the world to their will." Notably, to use Sloane's words in our own century, Napoleon and Wellington were in the possession of such noses. "Napoleon knew the secrets of noseology, he knew what advantages there were in a good Roman nose. He selected his generals, and put them into places of trust and confidence by the length and height of their noses. The Duke of Wellington, one of the most illustrious of warriors in times ancient or modern, had a strikingly remarkable Roman nose. By this nose he conquered Napoleon, and in that nose saved Britain from becoming a province of France. May she ever have such a nose in emergencies," and so on.

The Grecian nose, straighter than the Roman, lacks the fiery energy. It is more characteristic of amiability and refinement. It indicates passion, too, but its real passion means not the sword or the spear, but the lute of Apollo and the brush of Apelles. Byron fought and died for that nose, yet still the cup of Samian wine needs to be swallowed under protest.

But it is a comfort to think that there are other noses not so bad as the pug, nor so valiant as the Roman, nor quite so refined as the Grecian, but possessing in a mixed degree the best qualities of all, guided by a wise discretion. This in noseology is called the Composite nose, and it is the sort that is generally met with in the streets. "It should run in a direct angle," we are told, from the forehead, should be straight, regular, and of a good size. "Facts prove and circumstances confirm that this order is suited for attaining eminence in any of the arts and sciences, in the Senate or the Bar, in Commerce or in Agriculture."

The toper's nose speaks for itself. It is not by any means comely, but there is a certain amount of jollity about it which even Sir Wilfrid Lawson could scarcely fail to appreciate in presence of the owner. It bespeaks sack more than solids.

Flat noses are held in less esteem by noseologists than any other pattern. It is argued that the flatness of the nose indicates flatness of mind, and that no nation of flat noses have ever made their way upon the earth. So far as what we understand by civilisation this idea cannot be satisfactorily disputed.

It needs no ghost from the grave to tell that that hooked nose behind which is set the keen eye belongs to the race of the Father of the Faithful—that race which, enduring much contumely and cruel persecution through long centuries, persevered through all its toils, trials, and shocking sufferings in accumulating that powerful agency called Lucre to such an amount that it may almost safely be said to rule the world. Sloane has a wonderful appreciation of this nose. He is more eloquent about it than of any of the others, taking it from a pecuniary standpoint. He asks where are the Pharaohs, and then says, "That nose which toiled and strained under the whip of a task-master still exists in all its hooked rotundity, as large and as well defined as ever, whilst the nasal organ of the oppressor has vanished, and nowhere exists save in the remains of its sculpture."

WITH THE FALCONS ON THE MOORS

What destiny is it that has linked the name of Falconry with the irrevocable past? Either the pen of great Sir Walter, or the pencils of Landseer and Grüder, and half a score of others, or else the picturesque beauty of the noble art itself, has associated it for ever with the glories of a departed age. The falcon, with her bells and jesses, her hood, her leash, and her lure, is as much a part and parcel of the mystic Middle Ages as any proud abbot who lies beneath the cloister, or any steel-clad knight whose arms adorn what was once his feudal hall. So at least we feel, who in a fitful way struggle to revive the prettiest sport the world has ever known. Even as we meet once more to open the season on the 12th, we recognise the fact that the whole thing is an anachronism. We are fully conscious of our own perversity in seeking to reverse the verdict of fashion, and exhibiting to a prosaic age that which breathes only of poetry and romance. There are the hawks, it is true—our faithful servants and allies. These peregrines and goshawks have the self-same eye and bearing as their ancestors in days gone by. There are the same peerless forms, "unmatched for courage, strength, and speed," as did duty before the admiring eyes of fashion in the Court of the Plantagenets. But we know they are mere shadows of what they ought to be, bereft of those honours which chivalry paid to them, when a cast of Iceland falcons was a present for a prince, and none but those of noble birth might carry a peregrine upon his wrist. We feel ourselves, too, in our poor modern garb, out of character with the scene. Homespun and broadcloth harmonise but badly with the glossy feathers, the bright plumed hoods, and silver bells, and above all with the keen and haughty glance of these nobles of the air.

But it is time to cut short all sentimental regrets, and get onwards to the field. If we cannot have all the pomp and ceremony, the pride and circumstance of the old régime, we can at least have some of its substance in the shape of right good sport. Our falconer is beginning to grumble loudly and point to the lengthening shadows. A long morning with the guns has been succeeded by rather a late luncheon, and even the bountiful daylight of the Highlands is not inexhaustible. The hawks, who have been bathed betimes, before the full heat of the day, and who have hardly tasted food for a good forty-eight hours, are all ready hooded on their cadge. Even as they stand blindfold upon the padded wooden frame, they show signs, in their quick movements and close folded wings and tails, that they are "sharp-set," as the falconer's jargon hath it, and eager for the fray. This is a grand day for the youngsters—the "eyasses" who were in the shell three months ago, and have only within the last three weeks been "taken up from hack" and broken to the hood. All that they have yet done in the way of killing has been to strike down a pigeon or two; and this is the critical moment when they are to be first "entered" to wild game. You can tell the young ones at a glance by their plumage—the dark, rich chocolate of their back feathers, and the long mottled streaks that run down their breasts from the chin of the hood to the legs and tail. Their brothers and sisters of riper years are very different to look at—of a more slatey hue between the shoulders and on the wing, and having across their breast and thighs thin horizontal bars of dark grey instead of the longitudinal brown streaks of the eyasses. We are to have nothing but peregrines to day, for the two ger-falcons who sit hooded on the cage are only meant as a pièce de reserve, and destined to come into action in the unlikely event of the smaller falcons proving a failure. Eight birds there are in all, ranging in size from the great white ger-falcons, with their massive shoulders and strong beam-like wing-feathers, down to the male peregrines, the smallest of which is not above half their size. There is a very great difference between the male and female peregrine, the latter being about one-third bigger and really more fairly fitted to cope with a full-grown and healthy grouse. We must hope that the least able-bodied of the quarry fall to the lot of the male eyasses, and that if by bad luck we put up an old cock, there may be one of the elder peregrines, or, at least, one of the lady warriors waiting ready for him in the air.

And now we are on the moors again, and the old setter is ranging away to windward up the sloping ground. "Camilla," one of the young-lady falcons, is on the falconer's wrist; and at the first "dead point" off goes her hood. For a moment she stands restlessly, her jet black eyes taking in the scene, and then with a strong leap starts away down wind straight away from us and from the dog. On and on she goes, without swerving a yard from the line, and the new hands think that she is gone for good, and will never wear the hood again. Adam Woodcock knows better, and with a frantic gesture implores us to silence. At length, at a distance of 200 yards, the falcon turns sharp to the left, at the same time sweeping boldly upwards as she begins to meet the wind. Upwards in a great wide circle she wends her way aloft, her broad wings and tail showing like a great black kite as they pass between us and the afternoon sun. As she mounts steadily and swiftly to what the knowing ones call her "pitch," we move on towards the dog. No fear that the grouse will rise in a hurry with that great shadow looming overhead. She has completed her half-circle now, and is swinging round with outstretched wings far, far above our heads, peering down towards her well-known master with all the eager expectancy of youth and hunger combined. She knows that food is to be had somehow, but in what shape or form is still uncertain. As she soars still higher and higher, we march on up to and beyond the setter. Then there is a great whizz close among our feet, and that great leaping of the heart into the mouth which is the natural result. And then the plump brown body of a grouse is seen scudding over the heather. A few seconds more, and something rushes through the air, with a motion that can be felt rather than seen, and which makes the blood tingle in every vein. Not as noisily as a rocket, nor yet as quietly as a shooting star, neither with the liquid whirr of an arrow, nor the uneasy buzz of a shell, but with almost all their speed and almost all their force, a solid mass seems to shoot past us from the heavens in a direction which we only guess by instinct. An unconscious-impulse hurries us forward, with our eyes turned towards the flying grouse. Even as we catch sight of him he seems to wobble in his flight. With a convulsive effort he shoots suddenly upwards, as if to escape some obstacle in front. It is useless; the wedge-shaped mass of feathers which has descended meteor-like from behind shifts upwards at the same moment. The courses of the two flying bodies converge and mingle together. There is a faint thud, a fluff of feathers scattered on the wind; and the larger of the two bodies flutters majestically downwards, and is lost to sight amongst the heather. Now is the time for our friend Adam to keep back the inquisitive ardour of the field. The ladies are for riding up forthwith; the men who are new to the sport are for following on foot. All this must be checked: the young falcon must enjoy in peace and quiet the fruits of her first field-day, and only the well-known eye of the falconer must be there to look upon her as she feasts. We must be off to another part of the moor, to other quarry, and with other hawks. Camilla has been worthy of her namesake, and has opened the day with a glorious flight. We shall see many more before nightfall, and perhaps bring back a full bag. But it is unlikely that any peregrine, male or female, young or old, will rival the "one fell swoop" with which Camilla earned the first of her laurels.

New Novels

"CARITÀ," by Mrs. Oliphant (3 vols.: Smith and Elder).—From the period of its publication it seems a legitimate surmise that "Carità" was composed more or less simultaneously with "Mrs. Arthur," which we noticed some few weeks back. Now as it is not given, even to Mrs. Oliphant, to write two stories at once with impunity, it is probable that both works have suffered from the divided attention which was all that their author had to bestow upon them; and it is "Carità," we think, which has fared the worse. The situation with which the story opens is certainly an exceedingly strong one, Carità, or Cara, Beresford's mother, a sensitive, impulsive woman, still in the very prime and flower of life, seeing from her husband's face, after a medical consultation has been held over her, that her worst fears are confirmed, and that she is doomed to die of "a hopeless, miserable, lingering, and loathsome disease, which wore out even love itself, and made death a longed-for relief instead of a calamity," implores him by the love he bears her, and on the strength of a promise made when he never realised that he might be called on to act upon it, to give the drought that shall bring relief, and save her from agony and loathsomeness. The wretched man hardly knows whether he ought to comply or not; but anyway he feels he cannot do this thing, and rushes away in despair. But he has left the little medicine chest by his wife's side, and thus put into her hands the means of obtaining the swift and sure release she craves. Little Cara, a child of twelve, has been an unseen witness of the scene between the husband and wife, and stands by her mother's bedside at the final moment, with a very imperfect understanding of the meaning of what she has heard and seen. The physician, an old and valued friend of James Beresford's, in his heart believes that the husband has been moved by love and pity to become the slayer of his wife, and does not so much blame him for his deed as despise him for cowardice in not confessing the truth at least to him. Some critics, we are aware, have protested that no considerations of artistic effectiveness could justify the author in introducing such an incident into a work of fiction; but this judgment is based on grounds which we think would unduly hinder and cramp the artist. Still, while we hold the situation which we have delineated above one lawful for the novelist to seize and make the most of, we feel without doubt that it is not one that should be used lightly, but should powerfully affect the course and tone of the whole tale. We cannot say that this result seems to us achieved, or even seriously striven after, in "Carità," and hence feel the book disappointing. We hardly think that the story, such as we have it from the middle of the first volume, would have run to any appreciable extent otherwise than it does had Mrs. Beresford died, say, of consumption, in the most open and unmysterious fashion possible. True, Cara would not have had that vague, only half-comprehended suspicion of her father which, as she thinks, keeps a wall between them, but without it she would hardly have been really more to him, he not being a man to concern himself much with the doings of a young girl, in his eyes still a child. In short, we feel a want of keeping between the tragic prologue and the drama of ordinary and commonplace life that follows upon it, though this, if not altogether up to Mrs. Oliphant's mark when at her best, is quite good enough to be read with a fair measure of interest and enjoyment. We cannot attempt to give any idea of it here, but readers know "the kind of thing," as the phrase is, that may be looked for in the author's stories, and that they will find, though they will not find much in the way of novelty. It strikes us that Mrs. Oliphant's reputation will come to rest very much on her delineations of that large class who have, perhaps, received scant justice at the hands of novelists—the middle-aged. She sets them before us as they appear from their own point of view—as people by no means prepared to feel that they have done with life and to merge themselves in the happiness of a younger generation, but still with interests, and enjoyments, and it may be even with a little romance, of their own. James Beresford, such as he is when he has learned to find life again bearable, if not joyous, his neighbour, Mrs. Meredith, winning and loveable despite her more than forty years and her two grown-up sons, and "Aunt Cherry," an old maid of that special type which Mrs. Oliphant perhaps better than any one else knows how to paint, are certainly in our eyes the most successfully executed characters in the book. Nevertheless, fully acknowledging many excellences in "Carità," we should not be disposed to assign it a high place among its author's productions.

"Mottiscliffe: an Autumn Story," by James Walter Ferrier (2 vols.: Blackwood).—If literary faculty can be inherited the author of this story ought to possess it in no common measure. He is a son of the late Professor Ferrier, one of the most eminent metaphysical thinkers that these islands have produced, a great-nephew of that Miss Ferrier whose novels "Marriage" and "The Inheritance" were honoured with warm praise from Sir Walter Scott, and a grandson of the great "Christopher North" himself. And that he does possess literary faculty of a kind this clever story, rambling and sketchy as it is, affords ample proof. It is manifestly his first attempt at trying his wings in public, and as a tale is one of the very slightest we ever came across. Plot or incident there is absolutely none; the dramatis personæ do but talk—some of them, notably "Sir Val" and his younger daughter, remarkably well—and two couples of them are married at the end. The attraction of the book consists in some smart and graphic sketches of character, and many lively and pointed conversations. The principal figure in the piece, Sir Valentine Ormathwaite, a handsome and well-preserved gentleman of sixty-four, witty, good-natured, and easy-going to the tips of his fingers, is drawn with singular excellence, and strikes us as altogether a fresh conception. "Sir Val," an ex-diplomatist, is a prodigal with his money whenever he has any to spend, much addicted to betting and high play if he has the chance, and with suspicions of former "wildness" attaching to him, but is so far unlike the stock "wicked baronet" of fiction that he is adored by his daughters Margaret and Hildegarde, is abstemious in everything but tobacco, and is noted in town and country as a steadfast early riser. There is not a little humour in the hatred he is made to express for "respectful people" because "they remind him of his creditors," and in his admission, "I don't possess much ambition, but, egad, I should like to have written 'Don Juan.'" Next in merit to the baronet come, perhaps, his saucy daughter, Hildegarde, and the Right Rev. Charles Cope, Bishop of Tristan d'Acunha, who resides permanently with the millionaire, Sutton, because it was found that in the island which formed his diocese there was "no field for episcopal activity, or, indeed, for anything but penguins." The faults of the book are, that often the action—if the word is applicable in this case—drags more than a little, and that the author is a great deal too fond of coming to the front in propriâ personâ, taking the reader, so to say, by the button, and holding forth to him on things in general. But if Mr. Ferrier will keep his own personality more in the background, and can add some measure of constructive power and skill to the gifts he already possesses, his success as a novelist ought to be assured.

"Severed by a Ring," by Frances Geraldine Southern, author of "Gwynedd" (2 vols.: Remington and Co.).—This story is, at any rate, an advance upon "Gwynedd," in that it is a great deal more reasonable, and it might have been far better than it is if Miss Southern had not been in such a hurry to follow up her first work by a second. Such overhaste in production is always to be deprecated, and especially in the case of a writer so young as she manifestly is. Though the accidents and complications in her story are some of them improbable enough, it is not altogether ill-told, and some real power is shown in the delineation of the character of the heroine. If Miss Southern will educate herself for her work, and be less eager to run before she has properly learned to walk, we think we may some day have a story from her of which we need not speak with such doubtful approval. But we must be allowed to give her a caution on one point. She is evidently very innocent and well-meaning, but she dwells just a little too much on certain matters which, though among the realities of life, are discreetly ignored in polite conversation. She means no harm, we know; indeed, we doubt if she quite understands what she is writing about; but the trick is an unpleasant one, and if persisted in will cause her to be classed with writers with whom in truth she has nothing in common.

OUT OF THE WAY

MOST of us are now planning and arranging our annual holiday, and according to our different positions in life do we attack the question from various points of view. Are we family men, with children, nurses, and unlimited luggage to take into consideration? We must choose some pleasant sea-side resort where living is not very extravagant, where the air is pure, where the children can play about, and where we are within easy hail of home should necessity arise. Are we young and romantic? We must ferret out spots were romance still lingers in an attenuated form—countries hallowed by the historic and poetic memories of old times, yet which must go hand in hand with a certain allowance of modern convenience and comfort, for we are far too practical nowadays—even the most romantic of us—to undergo anything like "roughing it" in the search of the poetic and romantic. Are we tourists of the orthodox modern type? We must sketch out a vast map of lakes, valleys, rivers, mountains, cities, cathedrals, and picture-galleries, over all of which we must skim till we pull up sharp at the expiration of our time allowance, and at the bottom of our purses. And finally, are we simple seekers of health and recreation after our eleven months' turn at the bread-winning treadmill? We strive our utmost to find some refuge, "Out of the Way."

"Out of the Way" means away from all town and social associations for the time being, a temporary estrangement from the trammels of etiquette, and the boredom of town-life, a short relapse into the free and easy manners and customs which are really natural to us, but which have been gradually rubbed away by constant contact with the sharp corners of "respectability" and "keeping up one's position," and to get "out of the way" in these lightning days is no easy matter. There are so many of us searching after the same object, and our world has been reduced by steam into such a very small space, that we must hunt long, far, and wide, before we can hope to get "out of the way" to any sensible degree.

Spots which fifty years back were as completely out of the way as the Arctic Circle are now periodically visited by swarms of tourists from all parts of the world. What with "educational steamers" which survey mankind from Cornhill to Peru in three months', and tourist agents who undertake to transport one to Australia, China, and India, for very reasonable sums, it is a little difficult to imagine where there can be an out-of-the-way spot. Nor is it less surprising to be told that the ordinary holiday maker will find quite as out-of-the-way spots within the limits of the British Isles as out of them.

A Londoner proverbially knows far less of the capital in which he spends eleven months of every year of his life, than the country cousins who visit him at Academy, Derby, or Cattle Show time, and in like manner the travelled Englishman who has picnicked on the Great Wall of China, who has roughed it in the Cape diamond fields, who has felt earthquakes in South America, and who has camped in the Australian bush, knows very little of his own "right little, tight little island." Yet a railway journey of six hours' duration will take us as completely "Out of the Way" as we could wish. Reading parties who go to Normandy, Switzerland, and North Wales, in order to get "Out of the Way," always find out their mistake. Settled down, as they fondly imagine, in some sequestered village, surrounded by quaint old-world forms and buildings, and hearing no tongue outside their own circle but an unintelligible patois, they are not a little startled to find that as the fine weather sets in so does the stream of tourists and other misled searchers of the "Out of the Way." Of all men probably artists know best how to get "Out of the Way." Sportsmen come across very out-of-the-way places, but they are too engrossed in their own amusement to take note of them. But it is not good policy to consult an artist on the subject, as it is his dearest interest to mislead you. But follow him, and he will show you odd nooks and corners in primitive Cornwall, grand sketches of fairy land in Scotland, and quaint old places in the Emerald Isle, which you will admit to be completely "Out of the Way." And take note why this is. The artist never follows the railway line, or feels tied to certain cut-and-dried routes. The railway to him is a boon and a convenience, but a sad enemy to the picturesque and romantic, hence he avoids it when he possibly can. Together with artists, pedestrians and rowing men get more "Out of the Way" than ordinary folk for the very reasons above mentioned. "Rob Roy" in his canoe, the literary and artistic party that spent an "Autumn Holiday on French Rivers" in a four-oared boat, the writer of "The Dead Cities of the Zuyder Zee," are all men who have struck out original paths for themselves, and who have been well rewarded by getting well "Out of the Way."

But if it is difficult to find "Out of the Way," how much more so is it to keep it when found! If such a spot is discovered, the finder, urged by some inconceivable motive, is pretty certain to proclaim it to the world, at least so it would seem, judging by the letters which so often appear in our dailies, recommending some sweet retired valley, or some hidden village, to the notice of all intending holiday-makers and health-seekers—and what is the result? The place is subjected to a regular invasion, railway lines stretch out their arms and catch it in their net, huge hotels spring up, enterprising travelling agents dispatch weekly parties of tourists to it; its charm soon withers, and it sinks to the level of an ordinary gas-lighted, German band haunted, tobacco defiled show place. This has been the fate of many a little spot long dear to æsthetic wanderers as "out of the way," and as the process is still in operation with regard to others, in a few years, unless we extend our holidays two or three months, we shall find it nearly impossible to get "Out of the Way."

If we want to do so we must shelve Murray and Baedeker, abandon ideas of home luxuries, and be prepared to "rough it" a little. If, as is too often the case, we must travel and carry our homes with us in the shape of huge piles of luggage, and useless servants, we should not dream of getting "Out of the Way;" and, finally, if we do get "Out of the Way," how fully we are repaid for our toil and our little self-denials by the quiet, the ease, and the complete absence of all social exactions and restraints.

MESSRS. ENOCH AND SONS.——Pianoforte students and amateurs at home and abroad, who from time to time have listened with rapt attention to Rubinstein when, in response to encores for more lengthy and important works, he has given one of his own brief compositions, will hail with satisfaction Vol. 471 (Format Litolff), which contains no less than fifteen morceaux from his pen, including the already popular and favourite barcarolle (Op. 30).—Few of us would complain of "Nuits Blanches" ("Restless Nights") if we were soothed by Heller himself, or by some practised hand to execute the eighteen morceaux with which he has supplied Vol. 481 (Format Litolff).—Three baritone songs which "may be sung in public without payment of any extra fee"—a notice which to the uninitiated may at first appear superfluous, but is in fact of grave importance—are "My Ship Comes In," written and composed by J. Miller and H. Millard; "The Trooper's Dream," the joint production of E. Oxenford and Julia Woolf; and "Before the Storm," words by F. Langbridge, music by A. S. Gatty; either one of these three songs will be found suitable for seaside penny readings, &c. For like occasions a soprano or contralto may select "Maiden May" (published in two keys), written and composed by W. J. Stewart and A. S. Gatty.—A showy and effective tenor song by Victor Capoul is "Méka," chanson Hongroise, the piquant French words of which would lose half their charm by translation to our prosaic vernacular, and have been wisely left to their native tongue alone.—A naive little song, written and composed by F. E. Weatherly and Julia Woolf, is entitled "Little Nannie," compass from D below the lines to F on the fifth line.—By the same composer is a very sentimental love song, "My Star" (published in C and E flat), for which E. Oxenford supplied the words.—A refined and graceful excerpt from H. Litolff's "IV^me. Concerto Symphonique" is the "Scherzo," arranged for the pianoforte only, by the composer himself.—"Danse Rustique," a "musical sketch" for the pianoforte by W. L. Frost, is a really tasteful drawing-room piece.—A striking frontispiece to "The Carnival Galop," by G. E. C. Foster, leads us to expect something better than the tame music which is thus illustrated.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.——Part 35, Vol. V., of The Organist's Quarterly Journal is scarcely up to the level of its ordinary excellence, although there is not much to complain of. Nos. 1 and 2, a Minuet (A minor), and a gavotte (D major), by the editor, go far to prove that this style of composition is worn threadbare, and admits of no originality; No. 3, an Introduction and fugue, by J. Wrigley, A.R.A.M., shows careful study and knowledge of the work in hand, and is in fact the best specimen of the contents of this number.—"March Lyro," by J. Whitaker, is spirited and melodious, well calculated for the opening of an organ or any secular festival.—R. Anderson has ably set to music four well-known hymns under the title of "Songs of Zion" (Part I.), namely, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty," "The Lord is My Shepherd," "Eternal Father, Strong to Save," and "O Lord our God."—Two songs, the music of which is by W. Coenen, are far from his happiest inspirations. "The Rose" (Das Roschen) is a pretty German poem well translated by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, whilst "Yes" is written by Mary W. Clarke.—The poetry, by A. B. Edwards, is superior to the music, by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew, of a ballad entitled "Together."—Sir Walter Scott's favourite poem, "Waken, Lords and Ladies gay," has been once more set to music in the form of a part song, by W. A. Cruickshank.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED

THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. R. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. Parker. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 155, FLEET STREET; 29 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

MR. MECHI'S ADDRESS to his OLD FRIENDS and CUSTOMERS and to the PUBLIC: "As it has been erroneously supposed by some that I am no longer interested in my London business, I think it desirable to state that I continue to carry it on as energetically, and I trust, as satisfactorily to the Public, as formerly, assisted by my only son, who will in due time succeed me. It is now 50 years ago since I first commenced business in Leadenhall Street, and what changes have taken place! Then everybody shaved, and my razor and razor strop trade was immense; now moustache and beard are the order of the day, and the razor and strop trade is comparatively defunct. Then there were no railways, so people stayed at home and used wooden dressing cases; now everybody travels by rail, and we have dressing-bags to suit the altered conditions. Fifty years ago the poor geese supplied our pens, and many a now rich merchant in the City will remember the quality of Mechi's shilling pen-knives; but steel pens have extinguished the pen knife trade and the penmaking machines, and the geese are in peace, except at Michaelmas. In fact, steam has altered, and, I may safely say, improved everything, and has made us a nation of travellers both by land and sea. I wonder how much time is now occupied in reading the steam-worked press? and how much less time is occupied in sipping port wine, as we used to do 50 years ago, when we could not travel? Steam will make our 4 lb loaves cheaper some day, just as it has converted calico from 2s. 6d. to 6d. or less per yard. Then, again, a letter which used to cost 6s. 6d. to Cork is now carried for a penny. Sir Rowland Hill richly deserves a monument. But to return to business: 50 years ago, when I first commenced on a small scale, I made it an axiom that what I sold should be good and useful, and I believe thousands who used the Strop and Paste, which I personally invented, can testify to this; in fact, it was sometimes complained of that I stamped on my razors, 'Exchanged if not approved.' I have never, and shall never so long as I live, deviate from that principle, because it is the true means to retain and increase one's connection. I devoted my attention especially to the quality and convenience of arrangements in the Dressing Bag and Dressing Case Department, and in the tasteful selection of articles suitable for presentation, as well as in the matter of Dispatch Boxes and Writing Cases. Although both razors and penknives have 'gone out,' our sportsmen remain, and 'Sporting Knives' form one of our special departments. I feel firmly convinced that there is no fear of the departure of knives and forks, or dinners, so we make this an important department in quality and price. In conclusion, I ask no favours, but simply desire that my customers should compare the quality and price of my wares with those of other dependable establishments, and form their own conclusions. Most of my worthy assistants and workmen have been nearly forty years in my service, and long ago learned that civility and attention to our customers are as important as good quality in the articles sold. Illustrated catalogues will be forwarded post free on application."

AUTOTYPE PROCESS

FROM THE

ORIGINALS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine tact. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. Of the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

GOLD-MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

2, Manchester Square.

I have examined Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Check Action as applied to their Pianos, and consider it a most ingenious and valuable invention, which cannot fail to meet with success.

SIR JULES BENEDICT.

45, Blandford Square, N.W.

I have much pleasure in testifying to the great excellence of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianofortes. Their "Perfect Check Repeater" produces a touch that is absolute perfection, and which is unsurpassed by any other maker, native or foreign.

SYDNEY SMITH.

6, St. Mary Abbot's Terrace, Kensington, W.

To Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.

I have much pleasure in certifying to the efficiency of Messrs. Brinsmead and Sons' New Patent Check-Action (for Pianofortes), which I consider a very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted.

BRINLEY RICHARDS.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD-MEDAL PIANOS,

with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

The effect which "the Perfect Check Repeater Action," patented by Messrs. Brinsmead, produces on the touch, is everything that can be desired by an artist. It appears to me the most important invention of modern times, both for freedom of execution and expression.

I have equal pleasure in referring to Messrs. Brinsmead's New Metal-Back Pianofortes, which, as regards durability, richness, brilliancy, equality and contrast of tone, by far surpass Pianofortes of the ordinary construction at a much higher price.

I will not fail to draw the attention of Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian, of Schleswig-Holstein, to these inventions the next opportunity which may present itself.

CHARLES JOHN HERMAN EBERLEIN,
Conductor of the Philharmonic Society,
Capetown, Africa.

Bognor, Sussex.

The touch and tone of the Pianofortes manufactured by John Brinsmead and Sons are alike admirable, and having thoroughly examined their instruments, I have much pleasure in highly recommending them. In the present day there is so much imposition practised upon the musical public that the purchase of a Pianoforte that will give permanent satisfaction is a very important matter.

DR. T. LLOYD FOWLE, M.A.

I have great pleasure in certifying to the fine, rich, and powerful tone of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Pianos, also to the great improvements they have succeeded in attaining.

As a Professor of the Harp, I can safely add that the mellow tones of their Short Iron Gold Medal Grands blend charmingly with the instrument I profess, and form a delicious ensemble.

FREDERICK CHATTERTON,
Harpist to the Queen.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,

Dear Sirs,—Your Patent Action is one of the best I have met with. This combined with the equal tone of your instruments must commend them to those desiring a first-class Pianoforte at a reasonable price.

Yours faithfully,

8, Lower Rock Gardens, Brighton.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.

Gentlemen,—It gives me the greatest pleasure to state that I consider the instrument manufactured by you to be most excellent in tone, touch, and quality of material. I particularly admire your Pianos with the Patent Check Repeater Action and new Grand Construction, being a wonderful improvement upon the old system. In my opinion your firm having been successful in creating as good a touch to the Cottage Pianoforte as that usually accorded to the Grand. All those I have chosen have given the greatest satisfaction to the purchasers.

I am, gentlemen, yours very truly,
W. KUHE.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons. Dresden.

I have great pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your instruments. Your newly patented system, "the Perfect Check Repeater Action, when applied to these Pianos, greatly increases their value, and I have no doubt that these valuable improvements will excite general attention and admiration.

I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the perfection of Messrs. J. BOYTON SMITH.

Gentlemen,—I have much pleasure in testifying to the excellence of your upright and horizontal Grand Pianofortes, as they are simply perfect in touch and tone.

Topics of the Week

The Queen's Speech.——The Government had not a splendid list of legislative achievements to record in dismissing Parliament; but no one has been very hard on it for its comparative want of success. In these days Englishmen do not burn with ardour for political reform. They are content with a very moderate amount of Parliamentary work, and would, indeed, be rather bored than otherwise by excessive zeal. Besides, the Irish Obstructives to a considerable extent hampered the progress of business; and so much time was taken up in the early part of the Session with the discussion of the Eastern Question that members had little inclination for less lofty themes. On the whole, the references in the Queen's Speech to that question have been well received. The nation has given the most unmistakeable proof that it desires, if possible, to remain neutral as regards this war. It approves the course of neither of the belligerents, and would prefer that they should fight out their quarrel for themselves. At the same time we have rights in the East which it is impossible for us to ignore; and if these are threatened all classes will be in favour of defending them. The language used by the Government proves that it is in full accord with the general feeling. It will willingly help to restore peace, but only on one condition, that the terms offered be "compatible with the honour of the belligerents, and with the general safety and welfare of other nations." Fortunately Russia has no excuse for misunderstanding the limits within which we can safely maintain the position of spectators. Over and over again they have been defined, and in answer to Lord Derby's famous despatch at the outbreak of war Prince Gortschakoff accepted them as fair and reasonable. It may, therefore, be hoped that whatever may be the future successes of Russia she will be cautious in her demands. A Power which finds it so difficult to cope with Turkey can hardly desire to have to reckon with England also.

The Twelfth.——For once in a way, the poor "little brown birds," by the kind arrangement of the almanac-makers, have had a day's reprieve this season. Perhaps it was all the worse for them in the end, for after the quiet of Sunday, when there was no travelling, and no hard work done, the nerves of their enemies gained by the rest, while their eagerness for the Monday's sport was quickened. From the accounts come to hand, the supply of grouse is a fair one both in England and Scotland in some districts, indeed, far above the average, as the moderate price of the birds in the London poulterers' shops testifies. Though there has been a general outcry of the shortness of ways and means, owing to defaulting creditors abroad, who not only have our money, but cannot, or will not, pay interest for it, and commercial difficulties, there are probably more guns at work on the heather this season than in any previous one. The sport evidently increases in popularity every year, while the still increasing number of the wealthy and leisured classes create a greater demand for more ground to sport over than England, Scotland, and Ireland can supply. A few years ago, comparatively speaking, only those shot, hunted, or fished who were for the most part owners in possession, or residents on their estates; but now the followers of the learned professions, men in business, and affluent shopkeepers take to field sports. Thus grouse-shooting is no longer a reserved aristocratic luxury. Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, Lombard Street and the Stock Exchange, Lincoln's Inn and the Temple indulge in it to such an extent that the regular inheritors of the recreation, as the privilege of property, are not unwilling to make a profit out of the disposition which impels the wealthy cotton spinner, the manufacturer, the shipowner, the banker, the physician, the barrister, and even "the man of the counter," to purchase or rent a grouse moor. And who shall regret the taste of the renters and purchasers? It is a healthy sign of the times that they care to spend their money in this way, rather than on mere personal hobbies or in vicious idleness. It is surely a matter of congratulation that so many among us can find the most intense enjoyment from the sport which has set in once more. Even without the actual sport itself, a brief residence in the glorious Highlands is a grand tonic both for mind and body; while with gun in hand, and behind the wide ranging dogs, to wander over "the spreading moors—the purple seas that have no shores," is a pastime which, taking all things into consideration, has not perhaps its equal in this or in any other part of the world.

The War.——The Russians have failed to make good during the present week the very considerable losses they have sustained. General Gourko, it is true, still holds the Shipka Pass; and reinforcements are being brought to the front as fast as the Roumanian railways can carry them. But there has been no important Russian movement, nor are there signs that the army has recovered from the panic caused by its very unexpected disasters. Osman Pasha remains in his strong position at and about Plevna, and Mehemet Ali, while giving up none of his advantages in the neighbourhood of Rasgrad, has been reconnoitring, apparently with the intention of speedily taking the offensive. A combined attack from east and west on Gourko's line of communications would seriously hamper him, and lighten the task of Suleiman Pasha, who has not managed to drive the Russians before him so rapidly as many observers expected. Mehemet Ali is evidently a man of genuine military talent, decisive in action and prompt to make the most of his opportunities. In these respects he forms a striking contrast to the Grand Duke Nicholas, whose most prominent qualification for his position seems to be a faculty of appearing to do a great deal and really doing nothing. It is probably owing to his failure that rumours of peace have again been heard. A report comes from Vienna that Russia would be satisfied if Prince Hassan, son of the Khedive, were proclaimed Prince of Bulgaria. For the present, however, no such solution can be hoped for, since the Czar could not afford to make peace in existing circumstances. The war will go on, but it will be continued in a very different spirit from that in which it was started. Not only have the Russians learned the strength of their antagonists, but they now see, according to the war correspondent of the Daily News, that they were misled as to the condition of Bulgaria. The more favourable impressions produced in their minds by actual observation are amply confirmed by several of the remarkable despatches of Mr. Layard which have just been published.

The Blue-Coat School.——The report of the Commission appointed to investigate the state of Christ's Hospital in reference to the recent unhappy death of one of the scholars must be taken as fairly satisfactory to those who are interested in the old school. The two facts which it primarily establishes are—firstly, that the death of the boy in question cannot fairly be laid at the door of the monitor whose name was brought so prominently forward, nor to the general discipline, or want of discipline, in the establishment; and, secondly, that bullying is by no means a distinguishing feature of the school life there. The recommendations, therefore, of the Commission in reference to the future of the Hospital must not be taken as implying any stricture—at least, stricture of a serious character—on present arrangements. At all events, it may be said that, if the report involves stricture at all, it is on the system of the school, and not on the individuals to have to work under it. The unhappy occasion for the appointment of the Commission was rather used as an opportunity for inviting suggestions which might benefit the establishment, and few persons, we think, will doubt but that the suggestions made are most reasonable ones. As to the suggestions themselves, that which advises that for the future the Head Master should have supreme authority, instead of, as heretofore, dividing it with the Warden, will commend itself to any one with common sense and knowledge of the management of such establishments. The recommendations that the undermasters should reside on the premises and share in all domestic discipline, and that the "Grecians" should have their ancient powers restored to them, and supervise the "Monitors," will also commend themselves. But perhaps the most important suggestion of all is that the school site in Newgate Street should be sold, and the establishment moved into the country. The price which can easily be obtained for the premises would more than cover all expenses of the transfer. Of course there will be objections raised to this proposal, for in such matters there is naturally a very strong conservative feeling connected with old associations and local traditions. These, however, it is to be hoped, will be overcome. There is no substantial reason why the school should remain in London, as there is really nothing local in its character, the scholars being drawn from all parts of the United Kingdom. The premises are utterly inadequate to accommodate the number of boys in the school, and it is next to impossible to enforce good discipline in a cramped space. Moreover, for the well-being of the boys, it is indispensable that they should have greater facilities for amusement during the play hours.

The Famine in Madras.——It is probable that the allusion in the Queen's Speech to the famine informed a considerable number of people for the first time that this fearful calamity has fallen upon a large section of our fellow-subjects in India. The popular ignorance of and indifference to all that relates to our Eastern Dependency are truly surprising. Readers of the newspapers interest themselves intensely in events in Turkey; but many of them pass by as unworthy of notice references to India which, if that country belonged to France, would deeply stir all classes of Frenchmen. The present famine is one of the most terrible ever known. Eighteen millions of human beings are suffering from want; a million and a half would perish but for the scanty public relief they receive; already half a million have died. Disease has been brought on by hunger, and there is too good reason to believe that the two causes together will occasion in the immediate future even greater havoc than they have yet achieved. An earnest appeal comes to the English public for help. The need is far beyond the resources of the Presidency; and if Englishmen do not share the burden, it must fall with crushing weight on innumerable multitudes. It is to be hoped there will be a generous response to the appeal. All praise is due to those kind-hearted persons who are making sacrifices on behalf of the victims of the cruel war now being waged in Eastern Europe; but the sufferers in India have surely a stronger claim on their sympathy. We talk much of our resolve to maintain our Indian Empire; and there can be no doubt that for once talk truly represents the facts. But if we coolly allow crowds of the natives to die when they might be saved, the world will be apt to think—and with some reason—that in desiring to keep India what we are thinking of is not the welfare of the people, but our own selfish convenience.

What is Begging?——This difficult question has been raised again in connection with the fresh attention recently called both in Parliament and elsewhere to the importation into this country of Italian children. It is agreed on all hands that the practice is most abominable, and should be put down. In one sense it would seem that such importation cannot be prevented by legislative interference; and that therefore we are left to deal with the matter as a social one among ourselves. Mr. Ribton Turner, of the Charity Organisation Society, an authority on such a question, inclines to the view that both the children and their padroni can be dealt with under the Vagrant Act, the former as beggars, the latter as encouragers of begging. He submits that in reference to their employment in the streets "it is sufficient to ascertain whether the children are skilled performers, depending solely on the excellence of their performance for remuneration, or whether their performances are merely counterfeits, primarily intended to excite commiseration with a view to attract charitable contributions;" and he cites a case in which one of the police magistrates was ready to convict as beggars a couple of persons who were singing in the streets. A few days ago the magistrate at Clerkenwell convicted an Italian of begging, who had been playing an accordion in the streets, and had two children with him who asked alms of the passers-by. The children the magistrate sent to the workhouse. If children, wherever found by the police "begging," were thus disposed of, or sent to reformatory schools, the difficulty would soon be settled, and the Italian importation would soon cease. But "What is begging?"—and what if the principle suggested were applied to other cases? Where can the line be drawn between artistic singing or artistic performances and what may be called "begging by implication?" Common sense can soon determine these questions. "Frozen-out gardeners," who howl along a street "We have no work to do," are beggars; just as persons holding a few boxes of cigar-lights, or shoe-strings, or simply walking along the street moaning and groaning, are really beggars, though they do not actually beg. But there would be considerable legal difficulty in defining "begging." The public itself could do a great deal towards putting down many forms of "begging by implication," by simply refusing to give anything to "performers and sham traders." Actual beggars have become scarce, simply because people decline to give promiscuous alms in the streets. If people would only be reasonable, and not encourage Italian children and their padroni, the same happy result would ensue.

Passports in Italy.——Englishmen who intend to spend their autumn holiday in Italy have been good-naturedly reminded by a notice in the London Gazette that they ought to provide themselves with passports Many travellers are irritated by the idea of carrying about these documents; and, as they are nominally not needed in Italy, the majority of tourists naturally go without them. It is of genuine importance, however, that the advice of the Foreign Office should be taken. Italian officials have long been accustomed to the passport system; they look upon the possession of a passport as in some mysterious way a proof of respectability, while the presumption in their mind is that the man who cannot produce one is a rogue and revolutionist. Consequently an innocent traveller who has neglected to take the precaution may be exposed to a vast amount of inconvenience. He may be dragged before a magistrate, and if, irritated by such ill-usage, he allows himself to apply to his tormentors some vigorous epithets, the results are sure to be disagreeable. The best evidence of this is afforded by the experience of Mr. Rainford, who, when arbitrarily arrested, informed an insolent Carabineer that "he had exceeded his duty." For this offence he was condemned to pay a fine of 100 francs, and the sentence has just been confirmed by the Court of Appeal. Some officials who had been mildly punished in consequence of his unjust arrest are to be compensated by promotion. The story reflects little credit on the system of administration in Italy, but it ought to convince Englishmen that it is hardly safe to enter the country without the piece of paper which is supposed to give them a right to fair treatment. The demand may be extremely silly, but as it is made it should be submitted to with the best grace possible.

SUPERSTITION.——We are sometimes obliged to rub our eyes and ask ourselves whether we are really living in the latter half of the nineteenth century, when we read from time to time of cases of painful superstition which are made public. Notwithstanding the efforts of the schoolmaster and ministers of religion, and the advanced civilisation of the present day, the amount of superstitious credulity still existing in all parts of the country is simply astounding. To say nothing of the recent outbreak of Spiritualism, it is evident that there still exist among us thousands upon thousands of men and women, in town and country, who believe in witches and fortune-tellers, in charms, evil eyes, incantations, and a hundred and one degrading absurdities. The newspapers of late have been full of most painful revelations in this direction. An "astrologer" has just been convicted in North Devon of "using certain subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry and otherwise to deceive and impose on certain of Her Majesty's subjects," his means being the use of metal rods engraved with the names of planets, and with figures of heathen deities at their ends, as a cure for "bad" legs and arms. The witnesses he brought forward in his defence show he has a good practice. From Wales we learnt a few days ago that if a woman maliciously prays that her neighbour may be afflicted with the birth of twins, her prayer is efficacious, and twins come in due course. There are thousands of persons in the West who believe that the Lord's Prayer said backwards by a "wise" man or woman is a certain cure for a variety of ailments; while black sheep's wool dipped in red cow's milk at once arrests erysipelas, and a Good Friday hot cross bun, after being kept a certain time, is a sovereign remedy for whooping-cough. Really it seems that the world in such matters hardly grows wiser as it grows older. Must we confess that it is hopeless to expect that either Christianity or education will ever eradicate from the human mind its strange tendency to absurd superstitions?

THE WAR IN THE EAST

WITH THE TURKS—WOUNDED SOLDIERS RETURNING FROM THE BATTLE OF KEZANLIK

THIS sketch portrays a train conveying wounded soldiers and stragglers from the little Turkish force, which attempted to defend the position of Kezanlik, at the head of the Shipka Pass, against General Gourko. After some sharp fighting the Turks were worsted, and only 500 managed to escape to the station of Haskoi, where our artist sketched them on their way back to the head-quarters south of the Balkans. The river shown in our sketch is the Maritza, and the range of the Balkans may be perceived in the distance. "The soldiers," writes our artist, "seemed in a deplorable state, both morally and physically speaking, and many of them were wounded."

WITH THE RUSSIANS—THE SHIPKA PASS

THE last sketch represents the flight of the Turks from Kezanlik, and we here have the advance of General Gourko's little army, while forcing the Shipka Pass—one of the most adventurous expeditions on record. Our illustrations will give a fair idea of the difficulties to be encountered had the enemy seriously determined to defend the position, but by some strange negligence only two detachments of Turks had been left in charge of the pass. On July 16th General Gourko, advancing from the Hain Borgou Pass, encountered and defeated the Turks, and, pushing forward the next day, renewed the engagement, the Cossack tirailleurs advancing first, next the artillery, and finally the Bulgarian legion, whose main duty was to pick up and care for the wounded. The military correspondent of The Times bears witness to the gallantry displayed by the advanced skirmishers, who steadily pushed forward, despite a sharp artillery fire from the Turks, and assisted by the Bulgarians, ultimately succeeded in occupying Kezanlik, at the mouth of the Pass. At Shipka itself, however, there still remained a detachment of Turks, so operations were duly renewed next day, when the position was secured, and the Balkans rendered free for the passage of Russian troops. For full details of General Gourko's gallant exploit, we cannot do better than refer the reader to the full and highly interesting account given by the military correspondent of The Times, from one of whose letters we quote the following:—"Whatever may happen, the achievements of General Gourko's column will remain among the most interesting deeds of the war. A single storm in the mountains, a determined opposition at the mouth of the Pass, the concentration of a fairly strong force anywhere between the Pass and Kezanlik, especially if well provided with artillery; any one of these would have brought ruin, but fortune favours the brave, and the little column deserves a crown of glory." The Turks are said to have fought well, but to have marred their bravery with treachery and atrocious cruelty. On the 18th, when the tirailleurs attempted to carry the summit of the Pass, they gradually drove the Turks back into a small redoubt placed on a hill flanking the Pass. The Turks then hoisted a white flag, and made signs of wishing to surrender, but upon the Russians approaching poured a volley into their midst. The Russians, recovering themselves, at once made a dash and captured the fort, but still were unable to seize the main position on the height. On the 19th ult. preparations were again made for the assault, but another flag of truce came in with a Turkish officer, who promised that his men would surrender and march into the Russian camp if the attack was not renewed. Again the Turks were trusted, and again they proved false, as they took the opportunity to abandon the position and seek safety in flight. As for the cruelty, the route the Russians pursued was strewed with the bodies of Russian prisoners, who had been shamefully murdered and atrociously mutilated by the Turkish soldiers, this time not Bashi Bazouks or Circassians, but regular troops of the line.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF KUSTENDJIE

KUSTENDJIE was early occupied by the Russians after their crossing into the Dobrudscha, no opposition whatever being made by the Turks. On the 30th ult., however, two Turkish ironclads appeared off the town and commenced a bombardment, creating an intense panic amongst the inhabitants. The Russian batteries on the bluff to the north of the town at once replied, and a brisk cannonade ensued, which ended in the withdrawal of the ironclads, after having been hit twice by the Russians shells. Our sketch represents a view of the bombardment from the Russian battery on the cliff to the north of the town. Only two Turkish shells fell into the town, and the rest exploded near the battery in the foreground, and another battery, whence the sketch was taken. Beyond the windmill to the north of the town may be seen the British Consulate.

FIGHTING ON THE LOM

OUR sketches of "Saved from Mutilation" and the "Arrest of the Daily News Correspondent" represent incidents during some recent skirmishing near Rustchuk on the Lom River. In the former a couple of squadrons of Bildering's dragoons were pushing forward in the direction of Kadikoi, and were surprised by an ambush of Circassians. They were only able to fight their way back by a hand-to-hand struggle, losing some nine men killed and twenty-one wounded. The killed were brought into camp, for the Russians, if possible, will not leave their dead to the certain fate of being mutilated by the Turks.

As for the latter sketch, the correspondent in question was surprised by a party of Turks hidden behind corn-sheaves, and became involved in a cross-fire. "There was no pleasure in remaining in the awkward locality," he writes, "so I wriggled out literally, and reached the Russian forepost line at a part where there was no firing, when of course I was promptly taken prisoner as a suspicious person apparently crossing over from the enemy."

The sketch of "Loading an Ambulance Waggon" was also taken during the fighting on the Lom, our artist then being with the cavalry of General Baro Driesen.

COLONEL WELLESLEY'S QUARTERS AT BIELA

SINCE the capture of Biela that town has been the Czar's head-quarters, and consequently those of the British military attaché, Colonel Wellesley, who, after the difficulty with the Grand Duke Nicholas, had been especially attached to the Czar's suite. Colonel Wellesley, however, has now temporarily returned to England.

THE BATTLE OF PLEVNA

JULY 31st will long be remembered as one of the blackest days in the Russian military annals of the present campaign, for on that afternoon one of the finest divisions of the Russian forces in Bulgaria sustained a crushing defeat. The full details of the battle are well-known through the comprehensive telegram from Mr. Forbes of the Daily News, which, as that journal truly remarked, "was the most remarkable military communication that has been made to a newspaper" since the famous telegram to the same journal announcing the fall of Metz. The correspondent in question was a witness of the whole day's proceedings together with our artist, who subsequently ran great risk of being massacred by the Bashi-Bazouks. Overcome by fatigue after the battle, our artist had left Mr. Forbes in order to take some rest on the slope of a hill, and subsequently proceeded towards Radisovo, in order to be of service to the wounded. Fortunately for him he met a convoy outside the town, and joining it returned towards the Danube. Had he entered Radisovo, as he was reported to have done, he would undoubtedly have lost his life, for the whole of the wounded and their attendants in that town were subsequently massacred by the Bashi-Bazouks. To turn, however, to our illustrations. On the 19th and 20th ult., the Russians had suffered defeat before Plevna, and it was accordingly decided to attack the town and positions in force. Thus General Krudener was ordered to march from Nicopolis upon the right of the Turkish positions, while General Prince Shackoskoy should attack them from the south and left. The Turks were commanded by Osman Pasha, and, as the communication with Widdin was uninterrupted, they were able to obtain heavy reinforcements, bringing their number up to some 40,000 or 50,000, while the Russians only mustered 32,000. Moreover the Turks had great advantages from their positions, as Plevna lies in a valley running directly north and south, and is commanded by a series of ridges and waves, upon three of which the Turks had established strong entrenchments and powerful batteries.

The Russian attack began early on the morning of the 31st ult., General Krudener opening fire from a ridge on the right, above the River Grinica, and his example was speedily followed by Prince Schackoskoy, with whose forces both Mr. Forbes and our artist were attached. These were congregated

WITH THE TURKS—CAPT. ANNESLEY WHILE ON A RECONNOITRING EXPEDITION BEING PURSUED THROUGH A VILLAGE BY COSSACKS on a ridge to the left above the village of Radisovo, which was speedily taken and occupied by the Russians. Until one o'clock a fierce artillery duel raged between the opposing batteries, with the apparent effect of considerably damaging the Turkish positions, the Turkish cannon being compelled to quit the opposite height. Then General Schackoskoy thought the time had arrived for the infantry to go into action, and ordered a general advance, notwithstanding that it was clear that General Krudener had not made any progress, and that between the Russian and Turkish positions lay a valley and a steep slope. The infantry, who had been chafing at their inaction—for hitherto only the artillery had been brought into use—answered the summons with a glad cheer, and moved forward in one large undulating line down into the valley. They were warmly received by the Turks, but nevertheless pushed on the reserves, rapidly filling up the gaps made by the Turkish deadly fire. The Turkish positions were neared, and suddenly the officers waved their swords, the soldiers closed up into one concentrated mass, and then a general charge was made upon the entrenchments which, after a bloody struggle, were carried—the main earthworks being subsequently abandoned by the Turks, and the Russians thus became masters of the first Turkish position (see sketch). Flushed with success, General Schakoskoy now ordered his men to charge the second ridge, but although this position was occupied for a few moments by the Russians, the Turkish fire proved too deadly for them to hold it, and about 6 P.M. Turkish reinforcements coming up compelled the Russians to retire after a most determined conflict. Then ammunition failed the Russians, and though reserve after reserve appeared, it was only to swell the slaughter, the retreat at last became general, and the Turks advancing, Mr. Forbes tells us, "struck without stint. They had the upper hand for once, and were determined to show that they knew how to make the most of it." They advanced in swarms, recaptured their first position, and then began to shell the ridge from which the Russians originally began the attack. About 9 P.M. the Staff quitted the ridge, and then came a night of horrors. The way was littered with the wounded and dying, who had to be left to the mercies of the Bashi-Bazauks, and, when a bivouac was at length made, it was ultimately abandoned on account of the advance of Bashi-Bazouks. Our artist, as we have said, early became separated from Mr. Forbes, and joined a convoy of wounded going to the Danube. "We were guided from the battle-field," he writes, "by a Bulgarian towards Porlin. Our guide was led by two Cossacks with revolvers ready to shoot him dead if we were betrayed into the hands of the Bashi-Bazouks. Every few moments two horsemen scampered off to reconnoitre for our little party." The convoy safely reached Bucharest, where our artist was able to allay the anxiety which had been aroused on his behalf.

ASIA—A RUSSIAN CAMP OF WOUNDED

THIS illustration represents one of the buildings erected by the Red Cross Society of Russia for the reception of the sick and wounded. The sketch is taken at Magra, near Kars, in Asia Minor. In addition to the staff of regular surgeons attached to these buildings there are many young ladies acting as nurses and doing the minor duties of looking after and attending to the wants of the wounded, who if any important engagement is going on, are brought into the building in quick succession from the battle-field. Most of the nurses in our sketch are from the neighbourhood of Tiflis, one of whom, standing on the right, was very active in the Servian Campaign.

WITH THE TURKS IN EUROPE

"CAPTAIN ANNESLEY," writes our artist with Mehemet Ali Pasha's army, "is, as his name indicates, of English origin, his father having early in life taken up his residence in Obretenik. In 1870 Captain Annesley fought in the German ranks during the war with France, and was decorated for his services. At the beginning of the present war he took command in the Polish Legion of the Turkish army, but that body having been dissolved he entered into the cavalry, where he is at present serving. The captain told us the story of his unfortunate reconnaisance with the tears in his eyes—the Circassians who accompanied him having carefully remained outside the village, only rejoining him when he quitted it."

Another sketch depicts the much-talked-of Polish Legion, which at the beginning of the war the Turks attempted to form out of the many disaffected subjects of the Czar. The attempt, however, failed, and, as we have said above, the regiment was ultimately dissolved.

PRAVADY

is a small town made famous during the war with the Russians in 1828-9, and which not unlikely will be the scene of conflict in the present campaign. It is situated between Shumla and Varna.

RASGRAD,

where Mehemet Ali Pasha has his head-quarters at the time of writing, and where he has erected strong fortifications, is situated in a valley between Rustchuk and Shumla. Thither have fled numbers of fugitives who fear the advance of the invader, and amongst them are a large number of Jews, who have no love for either Russians or Roumanians. The latter, indeed, as is thought befitting by all Eastern Christians, have always shown themselves particularly hostile to the Israelite persuasion. These Jews have mainly come from Rustchuk, whence they have been driven by the bombardment, and have now taken refuge in the Rasgrad Railway Station. Another sketch at Rasgrad represents the arrival of a train of wounded, on its way from Sistova to Shumla—the inhabitants of the town showing a praiseworthy charity in supplying a drink of water to the sufferers.

RUSTCHUK AFTER THE BOMBARDMENT

WE have already depicted scenes of the bombardment of this town, and the present sketch will furnish some idea of its present aspect. The chief feature in the illustration is a Mosque in Konak Square, destroyed and burnt by the Russian shells. The top of the minaret has been cut off by a shell. The dome of the mosque is of tiles, but they are burnt and shattered, forming a pile of ruinous fragments without any regularity. The outer wall of the mosque has been breached at the main entrance, and a fragment of one of the doors hangs awry on the left. The whole of the court is filled with rubbish—bricks, tiles, beams; and the stones of the wall cover the pavement.

Another illustration depicts a torpedo which was fished up out of the Danube near Rustchuk, and which was sketched while lying in the Arsenal Yard. The length of the missile was about three feet. It was of iron, was inscribed with the number 153, and still contained the ends of the electric wire with which it had been connected with the battery.

THE MASSACRES AT KAVARNA

WE have lately heard a good deal of massacres perpetrated in this town, and the news naturally excited a great deal of anxiety for the safety of the Christians in general. Thus H.M.S. Rapid was sent to the scene in order to ascertain the truth, and an officer accompanying that vessel has forwarded the sketch from which our illustration is taken. He writes:—"H.M.S. Rapid has lately been employed in visiting the various villages on the coast of the Black Sea, which have been pillaged and devastated by the Circassian and Nogai Tartars as they retire before the advance of the Russians. Among the many horrible and melancholy sights we have come across, none were so bad as what we found at Kavarna, a large and (until lately) populous village about twenty-five miles from Varna. Here we found the Christian quarter completely demolished, all the houses burnt, and many signs of horrible deeds having been perpetrated, the walls of many of the houses were splashed with blood, and five or six dead bodies were found, cut, shot, and burnt in a sickening manner. I enclose the sketch of a scene in the yard of a Bulgarian house, where we found the body of a man stripped naked, and with the head fairly decapitated. It was evident he was a Bulgar from his sheepskin cap, which lay at his side. The party of inspection was accompanied by some zaptiehs and an armed boat's crew."

ASIA—HEAD-QUARTERS OF MUKHTAR PASHA

SARA KAMYEH is situated on the eastern slope of the Soghanli Dagh, and at one time formed the head-quarters of the Turkish Commander-in-Chief in Asia during his march upon the Russians before Kars, from which city it is situated about twenty-seven miles distant. The Times correspondent, writing thence after the march from Zewin, says:—"The state of the road over which we advanced was very different to that left behind Zewin. Every stream was well bridged with the trunks of fir-trees: the numerous bogs which abound wherever streams cross the path were filled in with boughs, fascines, &c.; gradients eased off; in fact, our progress was far more rapid over the improved Russo-Turkish road than over any other cross-road which I have seen in the country. We reached the two villages of Sara Kamyah, situated at the eastern end of the pass bearing that name, and ascending a ridge to the left, we saw the plain of Kars. The troops bivouacked on the slopes on either side of the pass in dense groves of fir-trees at an elevation of 8,200 feet above sea level. Fire-wood was there in abundance, but the water supply was bad."

THE GALLERY OF H.M.S. "CALCUTTA" AT PORTSMOUTH

THIS picture is another example of that class in which M. Tissot's pencil delights, and for which the name of the artist has become famous. We look in vain for some clue to the story which these graceful forms and charming colours may be presumed to suggest. The scene is susceptible of a thousand interpretations—some common-place and unpoetic enough, and others as full of exciting romance as the last favourite novel of the season. After mentally weighing the claims of each, we are fain to shirk the responsibility of selection, especially as the title chosen does not help us one whit. Perhaps it is the artist's whim thus to set his admirers puzzling their brains as to the occult meaning of his productions, when in reality there was no such object in his thoughts, which were wholly occupied with the conception of a new artistic effect. If, however, it is difficult to guess at the meaning of the picture, it is next to impossible to withhold admiration from the refined manner in which it is treated. The minutely accurate drawing of the figures, dresses, &c., in the foreground, the quiet water of the harbour, and the seemingly entangled forest of masts and spars looming dimly beyond—all bespeak the hand of a most careful and loving student of art; and when to these are added that clear brilliancy of colour for which M. Tissot is so well known (but which the engraver's art can only partially re-produce) the ensemble cannot fail to delight the eye.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——Parliament was on Tuesday formally prorogued by Royal Commission until the 30th of October. The Queen's Speech we have commented upon in another column.—Mr. W. H. Smith, the new First Lord of the Admiralty, has been re-elected for Westminster without any opposition. The nomination took place on Saturday, and the declaration of the result was made sufficiently early for Mr. Smith to take the oaths and his seat during the afternoon sitting. He subsequently addressed a meeting of his constituents at the Westminster Palace Hotel, thanking not only the Conservatives, but also the Liberals of the borough for saving him the trouble of a contest, and speaking in a modest, sensible manner upon the difficulty of the new work he had considered it his duty to undertake.—The post of Financial Secretary to the Treasury vacated by Mr. Smith, is to be filled by the Hon. Frederick Arthur Stanley, M.P. for North Lancashire, but as the office is not technically under the Crown Mr. Stanley does not vacate his seat.—In North Northamptonshire Lord Burghley (C.) has beaten Captain Edgell (L.) by 2,261 to 1,475. The election was attended by great excitement, and work for the glaziers has been provided on a large scale at the Conservative head-quarters.—The Clare election has resulted in the return of Sir Bryan O'Loghlen (H.R.), who polled 1,721 against 1,149 secured by The O'Gorman Mahon (Nationalist), and 764 allotted to Carey Reeves, the "Liberal Conservative." The Daily News, however, says that Sir Bryan has telegraphed from Australia declining to stand for the county.—Sir Baldwyn Leighton has been returned without opposition for South Shropshire.—Twenty of the ringleaders in the recent election riots at Grimsby have been committed for trial, but are at liberty on bail. The damage done to the Royal Hotel, Mr. Watkins's head-quarters, is estimated at 950*l.*—Although the resolution in favour of Mr. Butt's policy in the House of Commons was not put to the vote at the recent meeting of Home Rule members it is said that it was signed by upwards of thirty Irish M.P.'s, and that it is to be published with the signatures as a declaration of the opinion of the majority of the Irish Parliamentary Party.—Now that Parliament is up the floodgates of platform oratory will not be long in bursting open. The Irish Obstructionists, determined to be early in the field, have appointed a Central Committee in Dublin to organise "Demonstrations" in favour of their policy. The first meeting is to be held in Dublin to-morrow (Sunday), and will be followed by county gatherings throughout Ireland.—The meeting of the Home Rule Confederation is to be held at Liverpool on the 27th instant. Mr. Butt and Messrs. Parnell, Biggar, and Co. are all to be there, and as there appears to be some differences of opinion amongst the local Home Rulers, we may confidently look forward to as pretty an Irish row as was ever witnessed outside of Donnybrook.—William Lovett, an almost forgotten politician of a generation ago, died last week in his seventy-eighth year. He was a native of Cornwall, but came to London when quite young, and became the intimate associate and co-worker of such men as Hetherington, Holyoake, and John Collins, with the last-mentioned of whom he suffered twelve months' imprisonment for denouncing the conduct of the police in connection with the Bull Ring Riot at Birmingham in 1839.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.——The report of the Committee of Inquiry into the death of the boy Gibbs, and the general conduct of the hospital, must, we fancy, be somewhat disappointing to those who like to have the truth plainly spoken. As to the suicide about which so much fuss has been made, we are assured that nobody is to blame, not even the monitor who admittedly exceeded his duty by striking the deceased, while as to the general management, although the Committee find "many serious causes of complaint," the fault in all cases is laid upon that convenient scapegoat, "the system." The cure recommended is at least a sensible one. "Remove the school from London," say the Committee, and then, "under the care of an able and judicious head-master," all the defects of management and discipline will probably disappear.

THE COLORADO BEETLE.——Another supposed specimen of this unwelcome guest was, on Wednesday, found alive in a Post-office railway van, on the line between Plymouth and Bristol. The mail carried on that day came from the Cape, but as the carriage had a day previously conveyed the American mail, the insect is supposed to have come from America, and lain perdu for a time.—A Privy Council order has been issued, to take effect on the 31st instant. It prohibits the landing of any potato-haulm, leaves, or stalks from the United States, Canada, or Germany, and gives power to the customs officers to destroy all sand, dirt, and refuse brought with potatoes from those countries. Another order makes it unlawful to keep, sell, or exhibit the beetle in any stage of existence, and directs that any one finding a specimen should give immediate notice to the police.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The annual meeting of the British Association was opened on Wednesday, at Plymouth, under the chairmanship of the Mayor. The President, Professor Allen Thomson, delivered an inaugural address, in which he traced the growth of modern scientific opinion in relation to the origin of species, and said that he considered it impossible for any faithful student of embryology to reject the doctrine of evolution.—Sir John Bennett has again been returned as alderman for the ward of Cheap, polling 217 against his opponent's 99. Should the aldermen again refuse to admit him, Sir John will ask the Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel them to do so.—The Standard says that on Saturday, at the close of the Volunteer sham fight at Heaton Park, Manchester, a real battle took place between the 2nd Manchester and the Salford corps. When the bugle sound "cease firing" was given, the Salford men dashed after the Manchester skirmishers who were retiring, and fired full in their faces with blank cartridge. The latter turned and clubbed their rifles in self-defence, and before the mêlée was over several men on both sides were placed hors de combat, and had to be removed in ambulances. The Standard thinks that an official inquiry will be held, "although the authorities have done their best to keep the matter quiet."—The observance of the anniversary of the Opening of the Gates of Derry, on Monday, was productive of some rioting, to quell which the military were called out. There was a procession with twenty-five bands and innumerable banners.—Last week, at St. Just, near Penzance, five young children were burned to death in their beds during the absence of their parents. The father, a miner, was at a prayer meeting, and the mother had gone out to seek her two eldest children.—Among the notable deaths of the week is that of Mr. James Drummond, of the Royal Scottish Academy, who was born in 1816, and at the age of 19 exhibited a picture, hung upon the walls of that institution. Mr. Longman, the head of the well-known publishing firm is also dead.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——Stockton in the north and Egham and Windsor in the south have been the chief Turf gatherings of the week. At the first named there is invariably good sport, the most influential northern stables giving it their support, while the leading county families generally muster on the Mandale Bottoms in force. Lord Zetland scored the Trial Stakes with Spinster, who started the worst favourite out of four runners; while Scottie, the most fancied of the lot, was last. Backers, however, not dismayed, laid 3 to 1 on Muscatel for the Biennial which followed, and they could have afforded to lay even longer odds, judging from the filly's recent performances and undoubted goodness. Lord Zetland was again to the fore, winning the Cleveland Two Year Old Stakes with Canute, and the Harry Fowler Plate with Speigelschiff, whose name troubles the bookmakers' powers of pronunciation. On the second day the Katherine Logie colt showed in better form than recently at Newcastle and Liverpool, beating six others in the Lambton Plate for youngsters. Speculators were completely out in their calculations for the Great Northern Leger, for which Mavis and K.G. were most fancied in a field of seven, the winner turning up in Mr. Bowes's Jagellon, who beat K.G. by a head. The Wynyard Handicap saw another favourite defeated in Grand Flaneur, who could only get second to Mr. T. Green's Aragon. Mr. Green also secured the next race, the Harewood Stakes, with Gwendoline, who landed the backers of first favourites triumphantly. Altogether, the Stockton gathering was a great success.—At Egham there was a strong ingredient in the company of mere holiday-makers, who have little idea of the seriousness with which northerners attend such a meeting as that of Stockton. Still the racing was very good on the historic ground of Runnymede, fair fields and exciting finishes being the order of the day. Ambuscade credited Mr. Padwick with the King John Stakes, for which Lady Palmer II. was made first favourite. The latter, however, in a measure justified the views of her supporters by running second. The wear-and-tear Hestia won the Egham Cup, and Chesterton Her Majesty's Plate, for which John Day and that mysterious animal All Heart also started. Cherry beat ten others in the Stand Handicap, while the useful Water Lily carried off the Duke of Edinburgh Cup. The latter scored again the second day in the Welter Handicap, and Chesterton secured another victory in the Surrey and Middlesex Stakes. The Baron's Plate, another of the contests recalling the historic traditions of the course, fell to Preciosa, who started in a field of five at 5 to 2 on her.—Since our last "Sporting" the entries for the four great Autumn Handicaps at Newmarket have been published. Those for the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire are 141 and 184 respectively—the lowest numbers for the last five years.—By the way, it may be noted as a singular fact, but hardly a satisfactory one, that there were no less than four objections made at Lewes on Saturday last to animals which came in first, and of these objections three were sustained.

Cricket.——The inter-county matches continue to be played in all directions, and evidence no lack of interest.—The return match between Lancashire and Yorkshire at Manchester was a close affair, the former winning by only 35 runs. Mr. Hornby made another great innings, scoring no less than 88 for Lancashire.—Surrey and Middlesex have also played off their return, success again attending the former, the game being won by five wickets. The 74 of Mr. Lindsay, and the 93 of Mr. Read were the big scores in the 267 marked by Gurney in the first innings; but as Middlesex against this only put 110 together, Mr. T. D. Walker's magnificent 95 in his second innings only availed to save a disastrous defeat for the Metropolitan county. —Yet another victory has to be recorded for Surrey, whose eleven is in splendid batting form just now. Their victims on this occasion were the men of Sussex, whom they worsted by one innings and 92 runs. The Surrey innings showed the good total of 260, Mr. Game's 75 being the highest individual score.

Aquatics.——For the third time the two well-known scullers Tarryer and Brian have met over the London Championship course. Each had won a race, and consequently that on Monday last was the decider. It was a game struggle, but Tarryer had the race in hand for the greater part of the distance, and eventually came in a winner by two lengths. The race is worthy of record, as Tarryer rowed the course in 22 min. 55 sec.—the fastest time on record.—Up to the present the challenges and correspondence between Boyd and Higgins have not resulted in a match being made.

Pedestrianism.——Weston indeed seems a "glutton" at walking. On Saturday last he accomplished, at Newcastle, the 400 miles he had set himself to do in five days.

LEGAL

Our Detective System.——The Home Secretary has appointed a committee, consisting of Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson, Bart., M.P.; Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. William Feilding, of the Coldstream Guards; W. Overend, Esq., Q.C.; and J. B. Maule, Esq., Q.C., to inquire into the management, discipline, and efficiency of the detective force of the metropolitan police. It will be agreed on all hands that this step has not been taken one moment too soon, and our only regret is that the inquiry should not have been extended to the entire force instead of being confined to that particular department which happens for the moment to be under a cloud, especially as we believe that the detective force is recruited from the general ranks.

The Imprisoned Detectives, and Mr. Froggatt, the solicitor, who is charged with them, were again before the Bow Street magistrates on Saturday, and after a sitting of some six hours the case was adjourned until Thursday. Kurr's statements continue to be extracted from him with wearisome minuteness, though at times the smartness of his replies, especially under cross-examination, are provocative of laughter. On Saturday the chief thing elicited was the allegation that a number of other detective officers, both in England and America, had accepted bribes from himself and his friends in relation to the De Goncourt and other cases. Mr. Montagu Williams, the cross-examining counsel, obtained from him an admission that he had connived at a false charge of forgery being brought against Flintoff, a witness in the case. He flatly denied that he was repentant since conviction, and that he and Murray had been offered two "stretches"—i.e., years—instead of ten, to give evidence against the "coppers" (anglicè, police). Mr. Humphreys, his solicitor, had, however, told him, that the Solicitor-General had promised that, if he went into the box, the charge of forgery against him should be withdrawn—an offer which he refused. The rest of the day was occupied by Mr. Chambers in reading a number of extracts from a letter, and asking questions founded upon them. Kurr, however persistently denied all knowledge of the document or of the handwriting, and said that the contents were meaningless to him.

Would-be Suicides.——That the offence of attempting one's own life may be looked at from different points of view is curiously illustrated by two incidents which have occurred within the last few days. The first is that a woman named Frances Goate, who, for trying to poison herself with red precipitate, has been sent to prison for six months, no one being found to become bail for her good behaviour during that time. The ground of this extraordinary decision, for which we have to thank the wisdom of Mr. Hannay, of Worship Street Police Court, was that attempts to commit suicide by poison and by drowning differed materially, inasmuch as the one "implied preparation and deliberation" and the other might occur in a moment of rashness, a method of reasoning which irresistibly recals to mind the "Crowner's Quest Law" as laid down by the first gravedigger in Hamlet.—The other incident took place at Stockton, where a love-sick servant girl made three successive attempts to drown herself in the river. Just as she had been rescued for the third time a man named Wall came up and said to her, "If you wish to drown yourself, Miss, come this way, and I'll see that you does it." He then took her to a shallow part of the stream, and repeatedly plunged her beneath the surface, until she begged for mercy, and promised never again to act so foolishly. We do not say that Mr. Hannay exceeded his powers as a magistrate by the infliction of the sentence above recorded, nor are we quite satisfied that Mr. Wall was acting strictly within the legal rights of a private citizen; but we think that there can be little hesitation as to which of the two methods of treating would-be suicides is the most sensible, and likely to be the most effectual.

Miscellaneous Items.——The trial of the man Elliott, who was accused of maliciously damaging the confessional-box at St. James's, Hatcham, has resulted in a verdict of not guilty, the evidence of the verger going to show that the damage was rather the result of curiosity on the part of the congregation generally than of any individual attack upon it. Elliott was also charged with being in the unlawful possession of housebreaking tools, and with breaking into the church, but on these indictments no evidence was offered, and he was therefore discharged.—The other day two men were sentenced at the Central Criminal Court to six months' hard labour for stealing a 100*l.* note, the Recorder remarking that he felt bound to consider the temptation to which they had been exposed. It seems that the owner of the note had been in company with the prisoners at various public-houses, and in a fit of drunken generosity or braggadocio had produced several 100*l.* notes and asked them if they wanted any money. He followed this up by tearing one of the notes to pieces which he threw away, but which were gathered up and restored to him. Subsequently he fell into the hands of the police, and next day he discovered his loss. The defence was that he had given the note to the prisoners, but this he positively denied.—A young man named Neville, partner in a firm of solicitors, and assistant clerk to the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners, has been arrested on a charge of embezzlement and forgery. His defalcations already discovered amount to over 1,500*l.*, and the accounts have as yet been very imperfectly examined.—Several of the officials of the National Steamship Company at Liverpool have been arrested on suspicion of being implicated in some extensive smuggling transactions. The inquiry originated at New York, where the purser of the steamer England is in custody, and has confessed that during the last four years he has smuggled fifty barrels of silk and ten packages of lace. It is estimated that 1,000,000 dols. worth of goods have been smuggled from Liverpool to New York during the last eight years.—A chemist at Cambridge has been fined 5*l.* for selling adulterated soda water. Some of his samples contained no bi-carbonate of sodium, but 0·16 grains of copper to the gallon, besides a small quantity of lead.—A "White Witch" of the West Countrie who pretended to cure a sick woman by means of some hanky-panky tricks with a number of pieces of iron impressed with the names of different planets has been sentenced to a month's imprisonment for fraud, he having received 25*s.* for his services. Notice of appeal was, however, given, and the astrologer is out on bail.—Another curious example of superstition is reported from Flint, where two women appeared before the magistrates, one complaining that the other had threatened her life. It appeared that the defendant, who had just given birth to twins, had met the complainant and said, "If I was strong enough I would kill you, you have been praying that I should get twins," an accusation which the other took in all seriousness, and positively denied.—Three married women residing in the Forest of Dean have been fined 10*s.* each for assaulting a "commercial traveller," whom they appear to have adorned with tar and dirty rags. The report is silent as to the cause of this outbreak of Amazonian humour or indignation.—Another singular assault case is now being inquired into at Dorset. The defendant, a farmer, is alleged to have set a pack of dogs upon a man named Cox, who was trespassing upon his land, and who was so frightened by the animals that he has since gone mad.—Dr. Baxter Langley and Messrs. Swindlehurst and Saffery have at length been committed for trial for the alleged frauds on the Artizans' Dwellings Company.

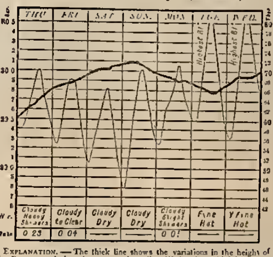
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

August 9th to August 15th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——During this period we have had very considerable changes in the weather from a period when north-westerley breezes and cool weather prevailed to one in which easterly winds of moderate strength prevailed all over the country, and finally to one when southerly and south-westerly winds have taken the place of the easterly wind, bringing with them very high temperatures. The barometer rose continuously from about midnight on the 8th instant till the morning of Sunday, the 12th instant, after which it gradually sank till Tuesday afternoon, the 14th instant. Since then a slight and rather unsteady rise has taken place. Temperature was very low on Saturday night, the 11th instant, and Sunday morning, the 12th; but rose slowly on the next two days. On Tuesday, the 15th instant, a most rapid rise took place, and 81° in the shade was reached both on that day and Wednesday, the 15th instant. The barometer was highest (30·08 inches) on Sunday, the 12th instant; lowest (29·50 inches) on Thursday, the 9th instant; range, 0·58 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (81°) on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 14th and 15th; lowest (46°) on Sunday morning, the 12th instant; range, 35°. Rainfall: Total fall, 0·28 inch, on three days; greatest fall in one day, 0·23 inch, on Thursday, the 9th instant. The sky has been cloudy generally, though clear at times.

Cremation is now legalised at Zurich, and the Paris Figaro quotes from a Teutonic journal the following announcement:—"I beg to inform all my friends and acquaintances that to-morrow at 3 P.M. I shall incinerate according to all the rules of the art my late mother-in-law, who has peacefully fallen asleep. The funeral urn will be placed near the furnace, Zurich, August 3. The profoundly afflicted son-in-law, Brandolf Lichtler."

Scraps

Pius IX. is said to be busily engaged on his memoirs, which he has been preparing for publication during the past eight years.

A new Sunday Journal of Sport and the Drama, entitled the Referee, is announced to appear to-morrow. It will be edited by "Pendragon," and will be issued at 1*d.*

Cabul is a dangerous Place for Tourists just now, as the Ameer is said to have given stringent orders that all "British spies" discovered shall be blown away from guns.

The De Tourville Tragedy, Mayfair tells us, has been dramatised for the Berlin stage, where it is played under the title of Henri de Tourville; or, the Catastrophe at Stilfser-Joch: a Criminal Novel.

Flotow's new Opera, "Les Musiciens," is not, as has been reported, a musical satire parodying the style of popular composers of the present day, but is simply a comic opera founded upon an episode in Mozart's early life. The work will first be given at the Grand Theatre at Turin.

A curious Discovery of Fossil Remains has been made in Pennsylvania. A mower, while working in a bog meadow, Towanda Township, found partially buried in the mud the skull of a mammoth. By digging deeper he exhumed the ribs and several pieces of the vertebræ. He expects to find the complete skeleton. The bones are well preserved. The skull is shield-shaped, has four large openings, and shows the marks of two horns, broken off, in a line, one above the other, in the centre. The face is ten inches broad and sixteen long.

Dr. Henry Schliemann's famous Trojan Collection is to be exhibited in England at the South Kensington Museum. It will include the gold and silver treasures, and on each of the objects exhibited the exact depth at which it was found will be inscribed, so that it may be seen at a glance to which of the four prehistoric cities, built one upon the other, the antiquity belongs. Dr. Schliemann is now at Boulogne, correcting the English and German proof sheets of his new work on Mycenæ. These he expects to complete by the end of August, when he will go to Athens to bring his collection to London.

The latest Railway Novelty across the Atlantic is a Turkish bath on wheels. It is a car that can run behind the sleeping coaches of an express train. It has a drawing-room, a Russian and plunge bath, shampooing rooms, and all the other accommodations of a Turkish bath house. The temperature of the rooms varies from 80° to 160°, and the compartments are lighted from the roof with blue glass. Travellers can bathe as well as eat, drink, and sleep on the rail. Such a car can be switched off on a side track in any town or village, and remain a day or two for the accommodation of the residents.

The Papal Jubilee appears to have brought large sums into the coffers of the Vatican, the various pilgrims' monetary offerings alone having amounted to 640,000*l.*, in addition to presents of great value. This sum will be divided into four nearly equal parts, one of which will remain in the Treasury of the Vatican, a second will be devoted to persons now and formerly in the employ of the Pope, a third part will be devoted towards restoring ecclesiastical buildings and monuments, and to works with the object of encouraging art and industry, while the remainder will be distributed amongst religious institutions.

London Mortality decreased last week, the deaths numbering 1,293 against 1,439 during the previous seven days, being 334 below the average, and at the rate of 19·1 per 1,000. The cases of small-pox declined from 22 to 20, and those of diarrhœa from 176 to 166, being 156 below the average. There were 43 deaths from measles (a fall of 8), 21 from scarlet fever, (an increase of 6), 29 from whooping-cough (an increase of 8), and 6 from diphtheria, (a decline of 2). There were 2,236 births registered—a decline of 172, and being 101 below the average. The mean temperature was 62·5°, or 0·4° above the average, and the duration of sunshine was 34·6 hours, out of the 104·8 hours that the sun was above the horizon.

An Interesting Incident in the Life of President Hayes is going the round of our Transatlantic contemporaries—At the battles of Antietam and South Mountain a colonel was wounded—his arm fearfully shattered—and he was borne from the field by his brothers and a private soldier. They carried him across the country a long and toilsome distance, every step of which was torture to the sufferer, to the house of a Maryland Union farmer. Then came the surgeon with his glittering knives and cruel saws, and made preparations to cut off the arm. But the farmer said he was afraid the man would die if the arm was cut off, whilst the surgeon insisted that the patient would die if the arm was not taken off, and the colonel's brothers coincided with the surgeon. So the determined old farmer despatched his son on his fleetest horse across the fields to the other side of the mountain to bring his friend and neighbour—a country physician and a rank rebel. Then there ensued a consultation over the sufferer, but the result was that the arm was saved, and after some weeks of careful nursing the colonel galloped off to join his regiment a comparatively sound man. He subsequently became Governor of Ohio, and now fills the Presidential chair.

A Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings is now in course of formation. The object of the Association is to preserve decaying monuments from so-called "restoration"—a term to many people synonymous with "desecration." Numerous well-known members of artistic and literary circles, including several A.R.A.'s, are amongst the members, and the Society, in the opening address, appeals earnestly to the public to put "protection" in the place of "restoration," and to stave off decay with daily care rather than to tamper with the original design by either rebuilding or enlargement. "Architects of the past ages were content to make additions or alterations after the fashion of their own times, nowadays they attempt to carry out what they imagine to be the design of the primitive builders, thus producing a feeble and lifeless forgery. This nineteenth century has no style of its own, and thus an interest has arisen in ancient monuments, and created the idea of restoration." The worst of these restorations have stripped ancient buildings of their most interesting features, and of their historical reminiscences, while the best are like an old picture restored, where "the tricky hand of some unoriginal and thoughtless hack of to-day has made neat and smooth the partly perished work of the ancient craftsmaster." The Society pleads for the treatment of our ancient buildings as monuments of a bygone art, created by bygone manners, that modern art cannot meddle with without destroying, as thus only can they be handed down instructive and venerable to those who come after us. Mr. W. Morris, 26, Queen Square, is the Hon. Secretary, and Mr. A. Marks, 52, Cornhill, the Hon. Treasurer.

THE WAR IN THE EAST.——The Trans-Balkan campaign has been abandoned by the Russians, and General Gourko has been ordered to withdraw to the other side of the mountains, where he is likely to be of far more use than in his present isolated and precarious position. Everything now seems to point to the continuance of the war into next year, as the delays inseparable from the transport of reinforcements, and the recent bad weather in Bulgaria, are likely to prevent decisive operations, while autumn rains will shortly be upon the troops. Thus all parties continue strictly on the defensive, with occasional reconnaissances, except across the Balkans. Plevna is, of course, the centre of attention. Russian reinforcements are rapidly arriving, more than 60,000 troops having crossed the Danube within the last three weeks, and a bridge has been built at Pyrgos, ten miles above Rustchuk, to facilitate the transport. It is thought, however, that the general attack will not be made for another ten days. The Grand Duke Nicholas will command the forces, as General Krüdener has been superseded by General Latoff, and General Schilder-Schuldner, who suffered the first defeat at Plevna, has been sent to Russia for trial. The Russian head-quarters have been transferred to Studeni, a village about two miles from Biela, and the Czar has removed nearer Sistova. Fifteen of the twenty-four corps of the Russian Field Army are now either in Bulgaria and on the Black Sea, or are being mobilised for reinforcements, and only picked regiments are being sent to the Danube. The Daily Telegraph Vienna correspondent estimates the Russian army in Bulgaria at 152,000 men, with 10,000 Roumanians, while the Turks have 190,000 troops, exclusive of the Egyptian contingent. The Roumanians are to join the Russian right wing, and are delighted at the prospect. Meanwhile Osman Pasha is improving his fortifications, and has had a few slight brushes with the enemy, the Russian attack on Lofcha on Tuesday week having been a small affair, turning entirely to the advantage of the Turks. The inactivity of Mehemet Ali is causing considerable surprise. His troops, however, had a skirmish at Arablar on Friday, a minor engagement near Rasgrad on Sunday, in which the victory is claimed by both sides, and on Monday occupied Sadina, where the Russians had advanced from Popkoi. The Egyptian forces under Prince Hassan are said to have joined Mehemet Ali, and are now on their way to take General Zimmermann in the flank. The General, however, is strongly entrenched at Tchernavoda, and his troops would welcome any interruption to the monotony of their life in the Dobrudscha, where they are suffering severely from malaria. A fresh bombardment of Rustchuk began on Tuesday, and the Turks returned the compliment next day.

Suleiman Pasha continues to press forward. On Sunday the Turks occupied the Firtazza Pass, while Suleiman's troops, under Rassim Pasha, attacked the enemy at Kalofer on Saturday, and on Monday drove them into the Rosalita Pass. Next day Suleiman occupied the village of Hain, and sent a reconnaissance into the Pass, where no Russians were found. The Passes once secured to the Turks, Suleiman will join the left wing of Mehemet Ali, and thence endeavour to march on Tirnova. Adrianople—which is filled with refugees—is thus safe until next year. Turning to ASIA, the Russians have assumed the offensive, and General Tergukassoff and Ismail Pasha have almost daily encounters. Ismail is being compelled to withdraw gradually across the frontier, but hitherto the engagements have been of little importance. On Sunday the Russians were successful at Demirdjilik, but appear to have been defeated on the following day at Ani, while 14,000 troops have crossed the Arpa-Tchai River. All the Circassians have now been embarked from Soukhoum Kaleh, and are to be sent to Trebizonde.

The Russian and the Turkish fleets have not been idle this week. Kustendjie has again been bombarded by the Turks, and the Russians have evacuated the town, while Hobart Pasha has captured several merchant vessels. Admiral Tchikatkoff has succeeded in convoying a number of steam transports and torpedo boats from Odessa to the Kilia mouth of the Danube, the steamer Grand Duke Constantine has burnt three Turkish vessels at Kilios, near the mouth of the Bosphorus, and the daring little Vesta has started on another cruise. Fresh reports of atrocities detail terrible Turkish cruelties south of the Balkans, where the Christian population are said to have been butchered wholesale. Official circulars denouncing Russian barbarity have also been issued by the Porte. Gallipoli is being energetically fortified, and the Porte has declared itself able to defend the fortress against any attack.—There is little stirring in CONSTANTINOPLE, save the report of a conversation between Server Pasha and Mr. Layard, in which the former is reported to have said that the Sultan would not be responsible for reprisals against the Christians if the Russians persisted in their inhuman conduct.—ST. PETERSBURG has received a message from the Grand Duke Nicholas, begging that no attention may be paid to rumours, and assuring the inhabitants that no news is good news. The St. Petersburg Gazette has published a long article on the future of England, in which it foretells the total decay of Great Britain.

SERVIA is protesting her intention to remain neutral, although all officers have been ordered to hold themselves ready, and the various departments of the army are energetically preparing for action. Dissensions are said to have arisen in the Cabinet.—ROUMANIA, although eager to take the field, is rather out of conceit with the Russians, as they have not brought the expected profit to the inhabitants, but entail considerable expense, and pay only in bonds. The Standard reports that Russia and Roumania have entered into a fresh convention, recognising the independence of the Principality. Should Russia conquer, she will take Bessarabia, while Roumania would receive an increase of territory.—In GREECE the warlike feeling increases daily. A demonstration in favour of hostilities was made at Athens on Sunday, and troops are fast being despatched to the frontier, while the fleet is to be put on a war footing, and a credit of 30,000,000 drachmas will be demanded.

AUSTRIA has refused to allow the passage of Russian troops through Servia, and is careful to preserve the strictest neutrality. There has been a large mass meeting at Presburg, where General Klapka spoke, and where a resolution was adopted strongly recommending the maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, while the Galicia Diet intends to send an address to the same effect to the Emperor.

FRANCE.——Bonapartist intrigues, rumours of dissension in the Cabinet, and the prospects of the elections equally divide public attention. The Bonapartists have been reporting disagreements between MM. de Broglie and de Fourtou, and have recommended the Premier to retire temporarily in favour of the Minister of the Interior, as the former is too timid to take decisive measures of repression. Yet the Government can scarcely be said to be too tender on that subject, considering the circular of the Minister of Commerce forbidding officials of his department to oppose Government candidates, the closing of two clubs at Arles, the dismissal of eighteen juges de paix, and the threat of the Ministerial Français that the Court of Accounts is drawing up documents containing grave charges against several prominent Radicals. The split between the two Ministers is denied by the semi-official Moniteur, while the Cabinet Council on Tuesday decided that the Duc being entrusted with M. de Fourtou's portfolio during his holiday was sufficient proof of a good understanding, and obviated the necessity of a formal denial. The rumour also that the state of siege was to be declared in time for the elections has proved unfounded. The Government is likely to find its Bonapartist allies more dangerous than profitable. The Rappel states that there will be officially supported Imperialist candidates in 336 out of 533 constituencies, and thus, should the majority be returned, Marshal MacMahon will probably discover a Chamber two-thirds Bonapartist too much for him. The Bonapartists have published their programme in M. Rouher's Ordre, and declare that the Third Empire "will be the same as its two predecessors, without deviation from their principles—an organised Democracy." Most of the Imperialists have left Paris for Chislehurst to be present at the fête of Aug. 15, which was kept in Paris by a grand mass at St. Augustin. There were a few cries of "Vive l'Empereur" and "Vive Napoleon IV." during the service, and M. Paul de Cassagnac received an ovation on leaving, but no disturbance occurred.

Marshal MacMahon has gone on a tour to Evreux, St. Lô, and Cherbourg, and will follow his trip to Normandy by a visit to Bordeaux and the South. His reception is somewhat dubious, as the Municipal Councils both of Cherbourg and St. Lô have declined to contribute towards the rejoicings, and private enterprise alone must supply the needful. It is believed that the Marshal, warned by his Bourges experiment, will make no official speeches. He is endeavouring to maintain his popularity by appearing as much as possible in public, and on Saturday visited the New Hôtel Dieu at Paris.

The heads of the Republican party—MM. Thiers and Gambetta, have met with rather rough treatment this week. M. Ordinaire—the Deputy who was expelled from the ranks of the 363 on account of financial troubles,—has issued a pamphlet violently abusing M. Gambetta, who, as yet, has deigned no reply, and M. Paul de Cassagnac, in the Pays, speaks of M. Thiers in most uncomplimentary terms, alleging the necessity to the Republicans of preserving the ex-President as "a bond to unite the scoundrels to the cowards, the lions of the mountain to the toads of that ditch which constitutes the strange menagerie that calls itself the Republican Republic." The Government jealousy of M. Thiers, according to M. Gambetta's organ, has instigated the most unworthy espionage, as his house in the Place St. Georges is watched, and the names of his visitors are given to the police. At all events the street sale of M. Thiers' portraits has been forbidden, while 80,000 copies of the Marshal's photographs are to be distributed in the provinces, probably in company with a pamphlet, "The Policy of the Marshal," which is being largely circulated. M. Thiers is being fêted at Dieppe, where he will very likely be joined by M. Gambetta.

In Paris there has been a political demonstration at the presentation of the Salon rewards at the Palais de l'Industrie. M. Brunet, the Minister of Public Instruction, was to have presided, and the students had got up a manifestation against him, but M. Brunet was ill, and they had to vent their spite on the Fine Art director. The 1878 Exhibition is getting on rapidly, prizes to the value of 60,000*l.* will be awarded by a jury of 300 Frenchmen and 350 foreigners, with 325 assistants, and a commission has been formed to organise a Musical Exhibition. There has been one first representation, a comedy Marthe, by M. Ohnet, at the Gymnase, and a new Conservative journal, Le Pouvoir, has been started, which is likely to become an official organ.

UNITED STATES.——A dangerous Socialist movement is on foot in Ohio, where the working men are holding meetings in favour of direct representation in Congress, State and Municipal Legislatures, and the alteration of the Labour Laws. There was a grand Convention at Cincinnati on Saturday, which nominated a candidate for the Governorship of Ohio. The party appears to be spreading all over the States, and has gained considerable strength from the recent disturbances. The strikes are not yet at an end in Luzerne County, where the miners have stopped and wrecked several trains, and prevented the non-strikers from working, while the boatmen's strike continues on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

In Virginia the Conservative Convention has nominated Colonel Holliday for the office of Governor, defeating the party favourable to the repudiation of the State Debt; in Maine the Republican party have named Mr. Connor as their candidate, while the Democrats have denounced the installation of President Hayes, and in Georgia a Convention is being held to revise the State Constitution. A Free-Trade Convention is to meet at Saratoga to urge Congress to revise the Customs' tariff.—There has been a serious engagement between the Nez Percé Indians and General Gibbons' troops, at Helena, Montana, when General Gibbons lost twenty-five men. The Indians are to be pursued.—A deputation of Chinese merchants at San Francisco have visited Senator Morton, to ask for legal protective measures, and suggest that every Chinese immigrant should be taxed 20*l.* They intend to claim indemnity for loss in the recent disturbances.—The gaol at Rio Grande has been broken into by Mexican marauders, and the Governor of Texas intends to demand their surrender.

INDIA.——The famine district in Madras, according to the Governor, contains 18,000,000 persons suffering from direct want, and two-thirds of the Presidency are exposed to a crisis greater than has ever yet been experienced. The Viceroy would visit Madras this week, and will consult with the Duke on the best means of obviating the distress. All spare grain is being taken to Madras, where the daily passenger trains have been curtailed to facilitate the transport. Rain reports are good from Bombay, but dubious in most other places, and the weather is exceptionally hot.—The negotiations for Yakoob Khan's release have failed, as he prefers imprisonment to a life of distrust and suspicion.

ITALY.——The Pope is anxious to bring the Hungarian Catholics into subjection, and intends to negotiate with the Emperor of Austria towards bringing them under the same rules as their Austrian co-religionists. His Holiness has written an amiable letter to Prince Amadeus, congratulating him on his recent escape from injury.—The Antonelli Will Case is causing so much scandal that it is declared the Pope has written to the King, begging him to stop the proceedings. His Majesty, however, replied that he had no power over the law.—The fine of 4*l.* imposed on Mr. Rainford for insulting an official has been confirmed, and it is said that the officials who have been punished in the affair now claim indemnification.—The harvest will be good in North Italy, but drought has injured the Southern crops.

MISCELLANEOUS.——GERMANY is entertaining a Chinese Ambassador, who is settling the affair of the German vessel Anna, and is establishing a permanent Legation at Berlin. The Colorado beetle has appeared near Schildau, close to the Saxon frontier. Army manœuvres begin this month in the Rhenish provinces.—In EGYPT much anxiety is felt owing to the slowness in the rising of the Nile. The Slave Convention recently concluded with England prohibits the import or export of slaves, and allows the capture of slave ships, while Egyptian slave traders will be tried as assassins. The Khedive engages to abolish private traffic in slaves in seven years in Egypt proper, and in twelve years in the Soudan.—In SOUTH AMERICA the President of Peru has liberated the defenders of the Huascar, the Pacific Steam Navigation Company's steamer, Eten, has been wrecked near Valparaiso, with a loss of 100 lives, and there has been a violent eruption of the volcano Cotopaxi.—The famine in CHINA continues, and reports state that for 200 miles along the river before reaching Shanghai the locusts cover the ground, and appear in clouds as thick as smoke.

THE COURT

THE Court still remains at Osborne, but Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice are expected to leave for Balmoral on Tuesday. Last week Her Majesty was visited by the Grand Duchess and the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, who left Osborne on Saturday. In the afternoon the Queen visited H. M. S. Thunderer, where she was received by Captain Wilson and the other officers of the vessel, and, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, was conducted over the whole of the ship, which she minutely examined, subsequently expressing her great satisfaction with all the arrangements. In the evening Her Majesty's dinner party included, amongst others, Captain Wilson and Commander Lord Charles Beresford, of the Thunderer. On Sunday Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice attended Divine Service at Osborne, the Rev. St. John Blunt, M.A., Vicar of Windsor and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, officiating. On Monday Her Majesty held a Council, during which Mr. W. H. Smith, the new First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Earl of Coventry were sworn as members of the Privy Council. After the Council the Bishop of Rochester did homage on receiving the temporalities. Subsequently Mr. William Richard Holms, Consul in Bosnia, Admiral Erasmus Ommaney, C.B., Vice-Admiral Edward Augustus Inglefield, C.B., and Rear-Admiral George Henry Richards, C.B., were knighted by Her Majesty. On Monday the three daughters of the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived on a visit, and in the afternoon the Queen held a Private Investiture of the Order of the Bath and of the Star of India, the Princess Beatrice being present during the ceremony. On Tuesday Prince Leopold returned to Osborne from Boyton Manor.

The Prince of Wales, in addition to accompanying Her Majesty on her visit to the Thunderer, witnessed some torpedo practice from the vessel on Saturday morning, and paid a second visit on Monday, when the ship getting under way, steamed through Spithead to below the Warner Light, when some practice was gone through with the four 38-ton guns with which the Thunderer is armed. The Princess of Wales remains at Marlborough House with Prince Albert Victor, who though fairly convalescent, is still very weak, so that his medical attendants cannot yet fix a day for his removal. The Prince and Princess of Wales are shortly expected to leave the south for Scotland. The Princess is entertaining her father, the King of Denmark, who arrived in London on Tuesday, being met at Charing Cross Railway Station by the Princess, and subsequently driving to Marlborough House, where he will remain during his stay in London. The Princess has been, at her own request, elected a "Dame Chevalière of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem," a Philanthropic Society presided over by the Duke of Manchester. —The Prince of Wales' celebrated herds of shorthorns and Southdown sheep were sold at Sandringham on Wednesday in consequence of Wolferton Farm having been let. The cattle realised 1,597*l.* 2*s.*, and the sheep, 989*l.* 14*s.*; total, 2,586*l.* 16*s.* —The Britannia training-ship is being rapidly fitted up for the reception of the young Princes Albert Victor and Frederick George, and the set of apartments to be erected on the vessel for the accommodation of the Princes and their suite, have been constructed at Devonport Yard. They will occupy nearly the whole of the poop, and have cost, exclusive of furniture, 2,421*l.*

Prince and Princess Christian on Saturday presided, at Windsor, at the annual fête and athletic sports of the foresters of the Royal demesne, Windsor. At the close of the sports Prince Christian presented the prizes, and subsequently the Prince and Princess visited the foresters in the tent where they were dining, and the Prince replied to a toast in their honour, which was drunk with three times three.—Prince Leopold, as Captain of the St. Andrew's Golf Club, will be present at the autumn meeting on the 26th prox., and will preside at the installation of the Captain elect, the Right Hon. Lord Justice-General. The Prince has presented a set of Tennyson's works to the Grammar School, Newport, Isle of Wight, as a prize for the best scholar. It has been won by a lad named Young.—The Emperor of Brazil is in Switzerland, and has visited Chamounix and Geneva.—Princess Elizabeth, second daughter of Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, has been betrothed to the Hereditary Grand Duke of Oldenburg.

MUSIC

GOOD NEWS IF TRUE.——It is rumoured that Mr. Arthur Sullivan is composing an Italian opera, on the subject of Marie Stuart, expressly for Madame Christine Nilsson. This would be a boon for either of our Italian Operas, where novelty is in terrible request. Madame Nilsson would be an ideal "Queen of Scots," and Mr. Sullivan is precisely the man to find music for such a theme—music endowed in equal degrees with vitality and character. When Italian operas proper are so rare as nowadays, and we are compelled to listen to such commonplaces as Esmeralda, Guarany, Casilda, Piero de' Medici, Santa Chiara, &c., it is hard that a chance should not be given to a young English musician of such tried capacity as the composer of the incidental music to Shakspeare's Tempest and so many other charming things.

MDLLE. TITIENS.——A paragraph in The Times of Saturday fully confirms the information contained in the last issue of this paper. The "impending operation" has been performed, and has left the eminent patient in a state of exhaustion not to be wondered at. Through "a curious coincidence," as Thackeray would say, a letter addressed to the Directors of the Leeds Festival, by Mr. Mapleson, giving a fair account of the exact condition of Mdlle. Titiens, and requesting that her name may be taken out of the list of singers for that occasion, is dated the very same day (August 11th) on which The Times paragraph appeared. The letter was not a bit too early; for Mdlle. Titiens was to have sung in Professor Macfarren's new oratorio, Joseph; and there is even now but scant time for Mdlle. Albani to study the part. Happily Mdlle. Albani is an excellent musician, and though Professor Macfarren's music is difficult, if only because it is original, it will present no difficulties for so practised an artist.

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.——The Messrs. Gatti have begun their series of Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre very successfully. Success, moreover, is deserved where so much genuine enterprise is exhibited. About the showy and elegant fittings-up of the auditorium by Messrs. Dayes and Caney, seeing that they resemble very closely those of last year, we need not speak. The orchestra, conducted by Signor Arditi, with Mr. Burnett as chief violin, and many distinguished professors in the ranks, numbers, with the addition of the band of the Coldstream Guards, not far short of one hundred players, whose quality was fairly tested by their execution of Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture, that of Auber to Marco Spada, and the larghetto from Spohr's third symphony, one of the most impressive movements to be named in the works of that prolific orchestral master. The piece of most importance to which the band of the Coldstreams lent its aid was a selection from the prominent themes of Gounod's recent opera, Cinq-Mars, arranged, in the accustomed olla podrida fashion, by Signor Arditi himself, and employing the varied talents of the principal solo artists—one and all, by the way, of first-rate excellence. Although we cannot draw any estimate of the probable merits of Gounod's new work from this mere stringing together of fragments, the audience were evidently gratified, and applauded accordingly. Among the new pieces were a "valse," by Signor Arditi, entitled "Le Tortorelle," and a polka, also by Signor Arditi, called "The Drummer Boy's Polka, in which the juvenile drummers of the Coldstreams were led by one younger than any of them—Signor Arditi's son, "Master Luigi," already, at his tender years, an expert. Both valse and polka were played with great spirit, and encored. The vocal and instrumental solos were agreeably varied. Mdlle. Pommereul gave a violin fantasia, by Sarasate, charmingly. The more we hear of this talented young lady the greater are our hopes as to her future career. Mdlle. Jane Debillemont, in Chopin's E flat polonaise for pianoforte, exhibited unquestionable talent; and M. Bouman, violoncellist to the King of Holland, won deserved applause for his performance of an andante and allegro by Golterman (accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Marlois). The solo singers were Signors Gianini and Medica (tenor and bass), favourably known last year; Mdlles. Rajmondi, Derivis, and Celega—the last a mezzo-soprano, the first and second sopranos, all three débutantes as far as the London public is concerned. Of these new comers we hope to be able to speak favourably on another occasion, when they may be unaffected by nervousness, each, as far as we could judge, possessing talent in a greater or lesser degree, though the sopranos especially hardly showed judgment in choosing pieces beyond their actual capacity. The recalls and encores, which unduly prolonged the entertainment, were too numerous to specify; but the first concert was indisputably a success. On Wednesday—a "classical night," to employ the old conventional nomenclature—the opening division of the programme was exclusively devoted to music which could hardly fail to satisfy the most refined taste. Cherubini's overture to Anacreon, the andante from Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Mozart's Symphony in E flat afforded Signor Arditi and his splendid orchestra opportunities for display of which they did not fail to take advantage. The incomparable scherzo of Mendelssohn, given in absolute perfection, was encored. A similar compliment was paid to Mdlle. Pommereul for her pure and graceful execution of Beethoven's first violin romance (in F), and to Mdlle. Debillemont, the pianist, in a familiar gavotte by J. S. Bach. Signor Medica sang "Non più Andrai," and Mdlle. Derivis' "Batti batti" (violoncello, Mr. C. Ould), but the instrumental music (a significant sign of the times) carried all before it—"See, the conquering hero comes," played as a march, with the band of the Coldstreams pressed into the service, bringing the first and best part of the entertainment to an end. Miss Rose Hersee and Signor Maurel will shortly be added to the company of singers, and M. Henri Ketten, "the French Rubinstein," is to appear early next month.

CRYSTAL PALACE OPERAS.——The Crystal Palace directors have resumed their afternoon operatic performances in the theatre, beginning with the Marriage of Figaro. This delightful work—to Mozart what the Barber of Seville is to Rossini—was wisely selected for the occasion. Extremely well given, too, in all its parts, the characters were sustained by members of the "Rose Hersee Opera Company"—Madame Hersee (the Countess), Madame Cave Ashton (Susanna), Miss Florence St. John, a promising débutante (Cherubino), Signor Campobello (the Count), and Mr. Richard Temple (Figaro), the subordinate characters being well supported by Miss Kate Villars, Mrs. Diton, Messrs. Marler, De Solla, and Arthur Howell. The company is altogether efficient, and powerfully aided by the Crystal Palace orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Sidney Naylor, a competent and experienced conductor. We cannot at present enter into details, and must be satisfied to add that the comic chef-d'œuvre of the most genial and spontaneous of composers was heartily enjoyed by an audience that filled the theatre in every part. Wallace's Maritana, the Trovatore, Don Giovanni, the Rose of Castille, &c., have been presented in due succession.

WAIFS.—Gounod's latest opera, Cinq-Mars, is to be given in Italian next season, at the Imperial Opera, St. Petersburg.—Madame Adelina Patti will decidedly not sing in Paris this year, nor has she as yet made any definite arrangement with Herr Strakosch about the proposed visit to the United States.—A new opera, called Wanda, by M. Dvorzak, a Czech composer, has been given in the Czech dialect at the National Theatre in Prague, and is well spoken of.—As we imagined would be the case, notwithstanding all the money expended upon Halévy's Reine de Chypre at the Paris Grand Opera, it has only achieved a quasi success. It was, indeed, hardly worth revival.—There are still twenty-nine theatres in Italy without managers for the Carnival; and yet managers in that favoured land are "plentiful as blackberries."—We are glad to learn that the accident which occurred in the Austrian Tyrol to the eminent violinist, Herr Lauterbach, is less grave than was supposed, and that amputation of the foot may in all probability be dispensed with.—Signor Gayarre, Mr. Gye's new tenor, has been staying at Milan.—Richard Wagner has been on a visit to the Grand Duke of Weimar, an enthusiastic admirer of the "Music of the Future."—The Royal Opera House at Berlin is to reopen on the 23rd inst. with Wagner's Lohengrin.—The net receipts of the Festival held in commemoration of Spohr at Hesse-Cassel amounted to 2,900 marks, a somewhat poor result for such an occasion. In consequence of his wife's continued illness Herr Joseph Joachim was unable to take part in the proceedings.—Miss Minnie Hauk will make her début at the Théâtre de la Monnaie (Brussels) as Marguerite, in Faust.—Signor Bottesini, the famous contra-bassist, "King of the Double-bass," as he is justly styled, who superintended the production of Aïda when first brought out in Cairo, at the expense and for the delectation of the Khedive, has been performing in Rome, with his accustomed success.—The duty on pianofortes in Russia has been raised to 100 roubles, much to the chagrin of German manufacturers, who have long enjoyed almost a monopoly of the commerce.

THEATRES

THE new play by Mr. Paul Meritt at the ADELPHI Theatre is of a widely different class from that of his comedy of Stolen Kisses, now performing at the Globe. It is a melodrama of the old-fashioned stamp, with, however, few traces of the coarse but often effective art which distinguished the best-remembered Adelphi melodramas. A murdered baronet is an almost indispensable ingredient in plays of this description, and Mr. Meritt has not failed to introduce his baronet, and to have him murdered in defiance of the Horatian precept, but in strict accordance with melodramatic canons—before the eyes of the spectator. Indeed he has even two murdered baronets; though one being not seen, but only heard of, fails to excite much interest in his fate. To tell the truth, it is not very easy to perceive the function of the invisible baronet, regarded as a factor in Mr. Merritt's story, for although he gives rise to a good deal of dialogue of a gossiping kind, he is actually dead before the curtain rises, and his melancholy end has but little influence on the progress of events.. It seems to have been deemed necessary, however, for the dramatist's purposes to have a Bow Street "runner" at hand at the very moment when the curtain rises upon the inn, whose sign—The Golden Plough—gives the title to the drama, and, as the circumstances of the mysterious death of the deceased gentleman are then under investigation, reasonable excuse is thus afforded for this early appearance of one of those famous officers of the law. The great fault of Mr. Meritt's play—apart from the inconsistency of conduct which characterises its personages, and the general air of unreality which infects its incidents—is the lack of a purpose steadily pursued. From one point of view there may indeed be said to be a thread to his story. If we assume that the grand object of the action is to ascertain who it is who hangs about the neighbourhood of the Golden Plough with homicidal—or say baronetcidal—propensities, then and then only the author may be said to set about his business, and keep his object pretty constantly in sight. But then there are so many people, and so many incidents introduced for the purpose, that the theme is greatly overweighted, and unfortunately nobody from first to last inspires much interest. The period of Mr. Meritt's story is the early part of the reign of King George III., when it is possible that Bow Street runners were as fussy and incompetent as he represents them; but as we have a good many inns of that period still existing, we may be permitted to doubt whether the village hostelries of that time ever resembled the Golden Plough, which is represented as a stone-built mansion with a noble portico, but without signboard or other visible token of refreshment for man or beast. The drama is played in conjunction with the new pantomime in which all the parts are performed by children; so that it is difficult to guess whether the Adelphi programme is designed for the benefit of the young and simple-minded, or the older and more sophisticated playgoer. The children's pantomime is, however, an item in the entertainment which well deserves the praises bestowed upon it. Fortunately it is repeated at an afternoon performance every Wednesday, so that little folks who are in town may see it without the disadvantage of late hours.

Mr. G. F. Rowe's comedy, entitled Brass, brought out at the HAYMARKET Theatre on Monday evening, is an eccentric production which it is not easy to assign to any recognised class of dramatic work. It is called in the playbills "a comedy-drama," but nothing short of some such a string of compound epithets as those which Polonius employs to exhaust the catalogue of possible entertainments of the stage, could fitly describe its incongruous elements. Farce, melodrama, and burlesque mingle together in one giddy whirl throughout five acts; meanwhile no story is in progress of a coherent or intelligible kind. The purpose of the play seems to be simply that of bringing on the stage—with or without reasonable excuse—a personage described as "Mr. Waifton Stray of everywhere," who brags of his exploits and marvellous experiences in the manner of Mr. Jingle, or of that famous Major imagined by the elder Mathews, whose constant refrain was "Upon my life it's true; what will you lay it's a lie?" Mr. Waifton Stray's cant phrase is "Fact, I assure you," and when he utters these words he generally applies his finger to the side of his nose with an air of great sagacity which is not warranted by anything that he has said or done. Unfortunately his stories have all the absurdity of those of his celebrated prototypes without any of their humour; and hence Mr. Stray, who speaks as a rule with a solemn nasal drawl, becomes after a while inexpressibly wearisome. The audience on the night of the first performance bore all this pretty patiently, and even meekly endured such old jokes as the anecdote of the gentleman who ate "pickled missionary" at the table of one of the chiefs of the South Sea Islands, and such puerile witticisms as a story of a boy who had a mother with a glass eye, and was born with a wooden leg. English playgoers, indeed, do not readily abandon the hope of being amused; but when in the final act Mr. Rowe presented himself with a ridiculous head of hair, which he described as "the wig of the British lion, trimmed by the paw of the French poodle, and invigorated by the Balm of Gilead," and began to talk with a German accent, and to playfully flourish a long knife in the face of the guests at an evening party, murmurs expressive of weariness, which had hitherto only been occasionally heard, began to increase in volume of sound. Why Mr. Waifton Stray did all this, or what humour was imagined to reside in his chasing a young lady round the room with this murderous instrument in his hand, while exclaiming "Come, let us die together! I long to look on the purple stream from your heart," were questions which appeared to admit of no rational solution; but the audience were now fairly tired out, and the curtain fell amidst ominous tokens of discontent.

SURREY GARDENS.——Those living on the south side of the Thames will find a varied round of amusements at these popular grounds:—Concert, a charming ballet, miscellaneous entertainment, and (on Mondays and Saturdays) grand displays of fireworks. The whole is now under the management of Mr. John Reeves.

CHURCH NEWS

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, the last in which ministers only will sit, came to an end on Friday last, Dr. Pope, in his closing address, urging the ministers upon their return home to spend one whole day in supplication to God for a blessing on themselves and the Churches confided to their care. The concluding services of the Conference were devoted to miscellaneous matters. Amongst other things, a proposal to sell the Centenary premises in Bishopsgate was discussed; but no decision was arrived at. Some excitement was also created by the suggested abolition of a rule dating from 1795, prohibiting members of the ministry to use tobacco in any form or manner. The vote, as at first taken, was declared to be in opposition to the rule; but this was challenged, and on the House dividing (a most unusual process), the result was the reversal of the former vote and the retention of the rule. During the past year the Commissioners have issued thirty-seven new works and reprinted thirty-four others, and the sale of denominational periodicals was nearly two millions. It has been decided to publish a new tract weekly, and to bring out a series devoted to the various aspects of the Sabbath question.

JEWISH MARRIAGES.——The Times notices a sermon preached on Saturday last by the Rev. Zedek Kohn, at the desire of the United Synagogue, to the Cutler Street congregation on the new regulations as to marriages issued by the United Synagogue with the sanction of the Chief Rabbi. The discourse was delivered in archaic German, mixed with Hebrew expressions, which is called Jüdisch-Deutsch, and is the language of the Jewish immigrants to this country from Russia and Posen, whose ancestors at an early period left their homes in Germany for the tolerant rule of the Polish kings. The United Synagogue are seeking to make known to the poorest Jews the fact that in this country the marriages which are valid by Jewish law are not so by the law of the land—a circumstance exemplified by a recent judgment of Sir Richard Malins. The Jewish law permits marriage by consent without a ceremony, or marriage by token, or giving a ring or coin; in addition to the more regular marriage by a Rabbi or other persons before witnesses. Marriages which were valid by Jewish law were for long held good in this country; but under the Marriage Acts special provisions have now been made for registering the marriages of Jews by the certified secretaries and registrars of synagogues.

A RAFFLE IN CHURCH!——The Peterborough Advertiser says that recently six Bibles were raffled for in the parish church by six boys and six girls, in accordance with the bequest of Dr. Wilde, a Puritan minister of the seventeenth century, who at his death made provision for the purchase of some land now called "Bible Orchard," the rent of which was to be expended as follows:—10*s.* to a minister for preaching a sermon on the excellency, perfection, and Divine authority of the Scriptures, and 12*d.* to the clerk; six Bibles, costing not more than 7*s.* each, were to be drawn for by means of dice taken from a saucer on the Communion Table, and the six persons who got the largest numbers were to have the Bibles. The minister was to kneel down at the Communion Table, and pray God to direct the lots to His glory.

VARIOUS.——A farewell address has been presented to Dr. Claughton by a large body of the clergy of the diocese of Rochester, who say that they shall long remember him as a loving spiritual ruler, and that their frequent and fervent prayers will follow him as Bishop of St. Alban's.—The seventieth annual session of the New Jerusalem Church (Swedenborgian) was held this week at Birmingham, the new President being the Rev. R. Storry, of Heywood. The denomination includes 64 societies, with a total of 4,765 registered members, an increase of 80 on last year's returns.—The Congregational Union of Wales held its sixth anniversary at Portmadoc last week, under the chairmanship of Mr. H. Richard, M.P., who made an able speech, partly in English and partly in Welsh.—Last week the London Gregorian Choral Association repeated "by request of a large number of working men," and by permission of the Dean and Chapter, the Festival Service given by them in St. Paul's Cathedral in May last. The service was magnificently rendered, and the congregation was estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000.—There was a report last week that Dean Stanley, who is travelling in Scotland, was very ill, but we are glad to see that it was greatly exaggerated, and that the Dean is now quite convalescent.—Last Sunday a new Roman Catholic church, erected at Belfast on the site of an ancient edifice, was consecrated by the Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of All Ireland. Most of the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland and some from England took part in the service, and the congregation was very large. 2,500*l.* was collected at the morning service, and at Pontifical Vespers in the afternoon another large sum was realised.

HOME HOSPITALS.——The scheme for the establishment of hospitals for the reception of persons able and willing to pay for their treatment has at length been constituted as the "Invalids' Home Association." These Hospitals are to be on the self-supporting principle, and if the scheme prove successful, convalescent homes at the seaside will be established in connection, in order that patients may complete their cure by change of air. Home comforts, the best medical attendance, and skilled nursing, will thus be placed within the reach of persons with limited means. The first expenses of the Hospitals will amount to about 20,000*l.*, and the Provisional Committee appeals for subscriptions—every contributor of over 50*l.* becoming a Governor of the Association. The leading members of the medical profession have signed a memorial on behalf of this movement—a "lay memorial" being also presented. The Lord Mayor is President, and H. C. Burdett, Esq., is the Honorary Secretary, to whom all communications are to be addressed.

CARIBOO HUNTING IN CANADA

THE woodland cariboo of North America is almost identical with the reindeer of Northern Europe, and is found in all the northern forests of Canada, from the head of Lake Superior in the west to Newfoundland in the east. It is a shy and wandering animal, travelling immense distances in search of food. Cariboo frequent rocky barren districts, and are consequently not much interfered with by the settlers. Unlike the unwieldy moose-deer which cannot travel in the deep snow, and so is easily caught, the cariboo can, owing to the peculiar formation of the hoof, walk on the top of the snow, and cannot be run down. It requires a good stalker, and favourable conditions of wind and snow, to approach within shot. The prettiest sport is when they are feeding on the "barrens"—great plains dotted over with spruce and juniper bushes. They can be perceived from a long distance, and the stalking is very exciting work. In favourable circumstances the sportsman can approach to within a hundred yards, and sometimes even less. Cariboo can be most easily hunted in the month of March. The snow-shoeing then is good, and the days long. It is almost a pity, however, to kill them so late in the season; besides, sportsmen naturally prefer to hunt them when there is a chance of getting good heads, namely, in the first snow.—We have borrowed the above details from a very pleasant book by Mr. J. J. Rowan, "The Emigrant and Sportsman in Canada" (published by E. Stanford), which we reviewed last year; and our engraving is from a photograph by Mr. W. Notman, of Montreal.

CIRCASSIANS DANCING

OF all amusements dancing is the one which has offered the greatest gratification to the human race. Civilised and barbarian people equally enjoy it, and no country has been discovered in which it has not been practised. Yet, strangely enough, no two races dance in precisely the same manner. Even amongst neighbouring tribes, as in the Caucasus, there are differences of posture or of style. Thus it is that the Tcherkesses or Circassians and Lesghians or mountaineers have a different pose and a more lively step in dancing than the Imeritians and Georgians. However, there is one custom which prevails throughout the Caucasus—viz., that all lookers-on at a dance should beat time by clapping their hands. As shown in our illustration, there is sometimes no other accompaniment. Should there be any music, it is generally a monotonous performance on the buben (tambourine) or the daira (lyre). The Georgians' favourite instrument is the zourna (bagpipe), which enlivens all their festive gatherings. Often the unharmonious sounds of the kettle drum are added to the effect.

CARIBOO HUNTING IN CANADA

As seen in the group, the Circassians and Lesghians, when dancing, raise both arms above the head, turning the backs of the hands downwards. They move on tiptoe very swiftly from right to left, and left to right, backwards and forwards, with a slightly leaping motion, ending the dance by a rapid pirouette.

The Imeritians also are very vivacious when dancing, but are more graceful in their movements than most of the Caucasians; also the position they assume in the dance is, to our taste, more attractive, both arms being extended over one shoulder with the palms of the hand exposed. The Georgians in the dance raise one hand and lower the other, turning the backs of the hands outward; but they move as slowly and as stiffly as figures on a barrel-organ.

Dancing throughout the Caucasus is performed by one or two persons, never by a number of both sexes together. If a man is about to invite a woman to be his partner, he first moves round the room on tiptoe, making all sorts of gestures, until he stops in front of the woman of his choice, still dancing, when she assumes the pose customary, and joins in with him. The eyes during the performance are fixed on those of the partner with a stupid, stolid gaze, the expression of the face being as meaningless as possible.

As may be seen in our sketch, everybody looks quite serious, and no gaiety is visible, for amusement is as solemn an affair amongst these people as it is a wild and savage pastime amongst other barbarians.

MR. MECHI'S ADDRESS to his OLD FRIENDS and CUSTOMERS and to the PUBLIC:
"As it has been erroneously supposed by some that I am no longer interested in my London business, I think it desirable to state that I continue to carry it on as energetically, and I trust, as satisfactorily to the Public, as formerly, assisted by my only son, who will in due time succeed me. It is now 50 years ago since I first commenced business in Leadenhall Street, and what changes have taken place! Then everybody shaved, and my razor and razor-strop trade was immense; now moustache and beard are the order of the day, and the razor and strop trade is comparatively defunct. Then there were no railways, so people stayed at home and used wooden dressing-cases; now everybody travels by rail, and we have dressing-bags to suit the altered conditions. Fifty years ago the poor geese supplied our pens, and many a now rich merchant in the City will remember the quality of Mechi's shilling pen knives; but steel pens have extinguished the pen knife trade and the penmaking machines, and the geese are in peace, except at Michaelmas. In fact, steam has altered, and, I may safely say, improved everything, and has made us a nation of travellers both by land and sea. I wonder how much time is now occupied in reading the steam-worked press? and how much less time is occupied in sipping port wine, as we used to do 50 years ago, when we could not travel? Steam will make one 4 lb loaves cheaper some day, just as it has converted calico from 2s. 6d. to 6d. or less per yard. Then, again, a letter which used to cost 1s. 6d. to Cork is now carried for a penny. Sir Rowland Hill richly deserves a monument. But to return to business: 50 years ago, when I first commenced on a small scale, I made it an axiom that what I sold should be good and useful, and I believe thousands who used the Strop and Paste, which I personally invented, can testify to this; in fact, it was sometimes complained of that I stamped on my razors, 'Exchanged if not approved.' I have never, and shall never so long as I live, deviate from that principle, because it is the true means to retain and increase one's connection. I devoted my attention especially to the quality and convenience of arrangements in the Dressing Bag and Dressing Case Department, and in the tasteful selection of articles suitable for presentation, as well as in the matter of Dispatch Boxes and Writing Cases. Although both razors and penknives have 'gone out,' our sportsmen remain, and 'Sporting Knives' form one of our special departments. I feel firmly convinced that there is no fear of the departure of knives and forks, or dinners, so we make this an important department in quality and price. In conclusion, I ask no favours, but simply desire that my customers should compare the quality and price of my wares with those of other dependable establishments, and form their own conclusions. Most of my worthy assistants and workmen have been nearly forty years in my service, and long ago learned that civility and attention to our customers are as important as good quality in the articles sold. Illustrated catalogues will be forwarded post free on application."

DRAWINGS BY THE ITALIAN

MASTERS:

REPRODUCED BY THE

AUTOTYPE PROCESS

FROM THE

ORIGINALS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

With Notes, Biographical and Artistic, by J. COMYNS CARR.

"This splendid volume. . . . Mr. Carr's choice of examples has been dictated by wide knowledge and fine tact. . . . The majority have been reproduced with remarkable accuracy. In two cases, minute gradations of light and shade are so well rendered that most people would pronounce the photographs hardly inferior to the originals. Of the criticism which accompanies the drawings we have not hitherto spoken, but it is this which gives the book its special value. Such criticism is rare in any country, but it is particularly uncommon in England."—Pall Mall Gazette.

EVERY FAMILY SHOULD READ THE PAPER CALLED

THE FOUNTAIN.

It is published EVERY THURSDAY, and is sold for ONE PENNY. Country booksellers may send orders to 54, Paternoster Row; Messrs. Marshall and Son, 125, Fleet Street; and Mr. R. Clarke, City Temple, Holborn Viaduct; where a large stock is always kept on hand.

The Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D., is the Consulting Editor of THE FOUNTAIN, and his SERMONS preached in the CITY TEMPLE appear regularly in its columns.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS should read THE FOUNTAIN, because the International Sunday School Lesson is always carefully treated in its pages.

THE FOUNTAIN is a rare favourite in the Nursery because of its stories, puzzles, riddles, and humorous poetry. No sooner do children get hold of the number for this week than they demand the instant production of the number for next week. This is the best of compliments.

The FIRST VOLUME of THE FOUNTAIN is now ready, price 4s. 6d. It contains the whole of a great Protestant story, of entrancing interest, translated from the German of E. Werner by Mrs. PARKER. This story alone ought to sell the volume by tens of thousands.

THE FOUNTAIN is a Literary, Religious, and Social Paper. It is full of essays, sketches, criticisms, and useful information. The grimmest reader will find some parts of it heavy enough for his dyspepsia, and the blithest soul will be gladdened by its incessant and overflowing joyousness.

THE FOUNTAIN is a wonderful favourite with AMERICANS RESIDENT IN ENGLAND, because it brings into one view very much of the periodical writing that is most prized in their own country.

THE FOUNTAIN goes into every part of the civilised world, and the letters which are received from its distant readers are most commendatory. It can be posted anywhere for one penny.

THE FOUNTAIN discusses men and things with courteous fearlessness. It advocates Temperance and Peace; it respects both Master and Servant; and has actually been known to suggest to masters that they have also a Master in Heaven.

It may be had at 125, FLEET STREET; 29 and 54, PATERNOSTER ROW; and the CITY TEMPLE, for the sum of ONE PENNY.

HENRY S. KING and CO., 65, Cornhill; and 1, Paternoster Square, London, E.C.

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

TALON ROUGE,

Topics of the Week

THE INDIAN FAMINE.——It seems to us that the help which is being sent out to India is not nearly so great as it ought to be. Englishmen do not seem to realise how vast is the need, and how genuine is the responsibility resting upon this country. An immense population is in imminent danger of dying of hunger; and that population is one with which we are connected by close ties. Surely no appeal has ever been made deserving a more prompt and generous response. The cause of the comparative meagreness of the assistance we are rendering is probably a lack of imagination. Every one can represent to himself the horrors of a war carried on by savage troops; hence there is no lack of aid for both Russian and Turkish wounded. The sufferings brought on by famine are less obtrusive, and excite, therefore, less attention. They are, however, not the less real; and the chances are that in Madras alone there has been far more mortal agony during the last few weeks than in Turkey since the original outbreak of the disturbances. In Manchester a public meeting expressed its opinion the other day that the British Government ought to organise measures of relief, if necessary, at the cost of the National Exchequer. A great deal might be said for this view; but it would be so dangerous a precedent that voluntary aid would be much better. If rich people would only pause for a moment and comprehend what is meant by the death of more than half-a-million by starvation, we are quite sure there would be no need for Government intervention.

DUPES.——Within the last few days the convict Kurr, as he stood in the witness-box at Bow Street shamelessly confesssing the story of his shameful life, has caused a sensation almost unequalled in the history of our criminal courts. But, apart from his wholesale charges against the police detectives, his declarations as to the various Turf swindles which he has either organised or been connected with must have created supreme astonishment among a large number of persons who were little prepared for such disclosures. Presuming that Kurr's statements as to the extent of his operations in this direction are in the main true, the number of persons he and his confederates have duped must be something enormous, and the thousands of pounds they have netted in the aggregate would have been sufficient almost to have made them all millionaires if they had not gambled away their ill-gotten gains or wasted them in riotous living. The sang froid with which the man gave the names of the places where these Turf frauds were carried on, the titles of the "firms," and the number of thousands of pounds which poured in in answer to advertisements, suggests that he felt a kind of pleasure in exposing the extent of dupedom. It is almost a pity that he did not give a list of some of the dupes who had sent him money, for then we could have had a good laugh at them. The infatuation which leads so many persons in all classes to dabble in Turf speculations is truly marvellous, when the stern logic of facts demonstrates to them that not one in fifty speculators do any good at the game, and when they know the danger they run of never getting their money when they win it. Recent legislation on betting seems to have done little or nothing to restrain the spirit of gambling, or to limit the facilities for indulging it, so easily is the letter of Acts of Parliament evaded. Indeed it is by no means clear that legislation has not done more evil than good by limiting "legitimate" betting, and so exposing the public to the machinations of artful rogues. However, we have no pity for the dupes, who richly deserve their fate; but we will hope that the exposures Kurr has made will have the effect of limiting the number of dupes for the future. When we reflect on the number of families of all grades which are more or less impoverished every year through this betting mania, the thought is a very painful one, and we should be only too glad to believe that it was possible by some means or other to restrain the folly so rampant throughout the kingdom.

THE WAR.——We are still without decisive news from the Seat of War. The Russians are steadily preparing for further action; but as yet they have done nothing directly to repair the disaster of Plevna. The Turks have hardly been more energetic. Suleiman Pasha has, indeed, obtained possession of the village of Shipka; but the Pass is still in Gourko's hands, and it is probable that he had resolved to give up the village as soon as the Turks had shown a determination to seize it. Osman Pasha and Mehemet Ali remain quiet behind their entrenchments. Some critics suppose that they will risk a great battle, but this is hardly likely. An unfavourable issue would be fatal; and on the other hand they can effectually defend their present positions. The most probable theory is that they will wait till they are attacked. Meanwhile, the Russians strengthen their positions in the Balkans; and reinforcements are being hurried as fast as possible to the front through Roumania. There can be no doubt that the Grand Duke will seize the earliest opportunity to make up for the losses he has hitherto sustained, for his troops are becoming demoralised, and at home there is extreme discontent at the dilatory manner in which the struggle is conducted. The Russian people expected that in a few weeks the Imperial eagle would dominate Constantinople; but months have passed, and that ambitious bird is still far from the Ottoman capital. In Asia, although the attack on Mukhtar Pasha has been renewed, the success has been no greater than in Europe. If this state of things lasts much longer the Czar may perhaps have something more serious to think of than the wrongs of the Bulgarians. There is no legitimate outlet under a despotic government for popular ill feeling; rage is apt to vent itself directly against the head of the State. And Czars have not always fared so well that the Emperor Alexander should feel perfectly confident of his safety.

KEW GARDENS.——Though the season of the year is by no means favourable to public agitations in reference to matters connected mainly with the metropolis, that whose object is the earlier opening of Kew Gardens is not likely to die away for want of support. The question has indeed been debated on more than one previous occasion, and apparently allowed to drop, but in reality a continuous interest has been kept up in it for some years. A public meeting at Kew within the last few days shows that the agitation is still very earnest, and that its supporters are determined to urge their demands vigorously. The demand, or rather the chief demand, is that the gardens should be open to the public at 10 A.M., instead of 1 P.M. The latter hour has been adhered to for many years on the ground that an earlier admission of the public into the gardens would interfere with the necessary work of the gardeners, and the scientific investigation, especially in the conservatories, of plants and their properties, which is the raison d'être of the establishment. This sounds fair enough, but we venture to say that the objection will not really hold water. The number of persons, even on such occasions as Bank Holidays, likely to be in the gardens between 10 A.M. and 1 P.M. would never be so great as seriously to interfere with any horticultural and floricultural operations of a scientific character; and as the public would probably be contented with the earlier opening of the grounds alone, leaving the glass-houses closed till 1 P.M., as at present, it would seem that the present demand might most reasonably be complied with. When we consider the enormous extent of these gardens, covering as they do an area of some 400 acres, the twenty or thirty thousand persons distributed over them could have but very little, if any, effect in retarding gardening operations. Admitting that the primary object of Kew, as a public establishment, is scientific research with a view to practical results and the benefit of the nation generally, the recreational view of such magnificent pleasure-grounds must not be lost sight of. Even with the large additions of late years we have not recreation grounds enough for the quickly-increasing population of the metropolis, and therefore the most liberal regulations in reference to those we have should be upheld. They are supported by the money of the ratepayers, rich and poor, and these are entitled to get as much in return for their money as possible. The scientific character of Kew Gardens would not, we think, for a moment be endangered by an extension of the visiting hours for the general public.

THE WATER SUPPLY OF LONDON.——It is now admitted on all hands that steps must soon be taken to provide London with an improved water supply. For purposes of cleanliness, manufacturing, and road-watering we have enough; but there is not nearly an adequate quantity for the extinction of fires, and he must, indeed, be an optimist who maintains that the water we possess is sufficiently pure for drinking. We are constantly being told of the organic matter we consume in water; and there is too much reason to fear that the most sensational accounts are those which are nearest the truth. Obviously this state of things cannot be allowed to go on. Sufficient guarantees must be provided for the safety of the vast property of London; and if we have any regard for the health and moral improvement of the community we must bring genuinely palatable water within reach of all classes. It is often supposed that if the powers of the water companies were transferred to the municipal authorities all difficulty would be at an end; but while our sole supply is from the Thames it is impossible either materially to increase the quantity or to improve the quality. A scheme which finds favour with some reformers is that we should obtain water from the Lake district; but the vast expense alone puts this beyond reach. A far more practical suggestion is that made by Mr. Bramwell and Mr. Easton in the valuable paper read by the former to the British Association on Monday. They propose that the companies should continue to supply water as at present; but that for potable water and the amount necessary for fire extinction we should tap the enormous stores in the chalk formations to the north and south of London. We could thus procure sixteen million gallons daily, and the cost of the works would not exceed 5,500,000*l.* It is to be hoped this plan will not be allowed to drop out of sight. A Glasgow baillie is said to have objected to the pure water derived by that city from Loch Katriue that "it had neither taste, colour, nor smell." Most people, however, would willingly dispense with the qualities which seemed so essential to the worthy magistrate.

THE HOP-PICKERS.——Within a few days many thousands of the very poorest inhabitants of the metropolis—men, women, and children—will have found their way to the Hop districts of Kent and Surrey; and those interested in their welfare will be glad to hear that, owing to the philanthropic action of the Society for the Employment and Improved Lodging of Hop-pickers, a large portion of them will now be better cared for than heretofore. In fact the time is at hand when the horrible scandals connected with the housing of these poor people will be things of the past. Under a clause in the Sanitary Amendment Act of 1874 the local sanitary authorities may now make bye-laws for regulating the lodging and other treatment of the immigrant hop-pickers. Several of these authorities have already had their bye-laws confirmed by the Local Government Board, and with a little pressure others will probably follow the good example set them. If they do not, it is by no means improbable that next Session the clause in the Act alluded to, which is now permissive, will be made compulsory. The reform already brought about is an instance of what can be done by a small band of earnest men who labour hard in a good cause even when, as in this case, the difficulties in their way seemed insurmountable. The Society has recently also taken a further step on behalf of the hop-pickers by forming an association for supplying clergy and readers to minister to them. Tents suitable to Divine Service will be provided, as well as books and tracts suitable for distribution. The Society has the earnest co-operation of the Archbishop of Canterbury and of the clergy in the chief hop districts, who cannot unaided attend as they would wish to the spiritual needs of the thousands of poor persons annually imported into their parishes. Hop-picking on a bright day has a very pretty and poetical aspect, but for many years there has been a most painful reverse to the picture.

LAUNDRIES AND DISEASE.——The Lancet has succeeded in calling attention to a very grave evil. There can be no doubt now that the custom of sending out clothes to be washed is attended by the most serious risks. The difficulty is, however, how to provide a remedy. In old times washing was done at home; and if that were still possible it would unquestionably be the best plan. But either from a whim of servants or because of some real necessity it is assumed that families must put out their washing. The next best device is probably that of public laundries. In a very able letter to The Times the other day a lady urged that these institutions should be encouraged; and her arguments must have convinced every one who considered them. Not only is disease spread abroad by the present system, but the poor women themselves are inevitably demoralised. They have to work against time and in active competition with many rivals; and it is to be feared there are few of them who do not keep up their courage by quite other than moral stimulants. In regularly organised laundries they would be sure of their wages, their hours of work would be fixed, and they would be removed from the temptations to which so many of them now succumb. On the other hand, the work of cleansing would be effected far more thoroughly, and all danger of infection would be removed. At the same time work would be provided for a large class of women, since, as the writer to whom we have alluded asserts, "a well-organised laundry will bring out the skill of a lady and use the services of a peasant." The power of custom in this country is very great; but we cannot suppose that in this instance it will stand against such considerations as these.

SHOP AWNINGS.——No one will blame a shopkeeper for endeavouring to protect the goods in his window from the injurious effects of the sun's rays; but, when he persists in obstructing the Queen's highway by allowing the framework or canvas of his awnings to interfere with the heads and hats of pedestrians, he must not wonder if the public shows some resentment. The awning grievance has been a long-standing one, and the police seem to have done little or nothing in the matter. At last, however, it has been taken up at the Wandsworth Police Court, and apparently to his surprise a tradesman of the district has been fined for not having his awning up to the regular height. In vain he pleaded that he was only one of many offenders; the magistrate very properly would not take this as an excuse, and intimated that it would be well that the local Board should employ some tall man to practically test the height of all the awnings in the neighbourhood, as "to tall men in the streets sun-blinds were an intolerable nuisance." The worthy magistrate might have added "to the short also;" for, as a matter of fact, there is hardly a street in London during the summer along which men of average stature with the national chimney-pot hats on their heads can walk without coming in contact with these offending awnings. It appears that nine feet is the regulation height, and though this is more than is actually required except for the veritable sons of Anak, it would be most acceptable to the general public if the height just mentioned were insisted on. Foot passengers would then be enabled to use their umbrellas when it rained; whereas now, when a shower comes on, some of the awnings are raised and some not, and passengers have continually to lower their umbrellas and run a gauntlet of drippings. A cognate question to that of awnings is the overhanging of boughs along suburban pathways. In some districts the nuisance is very prevalent; and really it is not a matter of little consequence to suddenly find one's hat and head in a bough, especially when it is well laden with drops of rain. A height of seven feet at least should be the minimum for both awnings and boughs, as this would meet the difficulties of six-feet men. Of course we cannot legislate for extreme "outside sizes" such as that of a gentleman of nine and a half feet, who, as a letter from the Cape informs us, has recently arrived at the colony to seek ordination at the hands of one of the South African Bishops. But there must be many thousands of six-feet men in the metropolis to whom low hanging awnings and boughs are a source of great annoyance.

THE WAR IN THE EAST

ACROSS THE BALKANS WITH GENERAL GOURKO

THIS sketch represents an incident of the march of General Gourko in the Shipka Pass of the Balkans which we described and illustrated last week. The General and his artillery had duly reached the summit of the Pass, and the General and his Staff bidding a temporary adieu to the troops, and guided by a Bulgarian, proceed to descend the southern slope of the mountains. After a while darkness set in, a gorge was entered, and the little party felt completely at the mercy of the Bulgarian guide, as no man who had not previously traversed the road could possibly find the way. The Times correspondent describing the journey writes: "Sometimes the trees meet overhead, and the riders have to stoop suddenly when a branch appears marked in sombre shade against the bright stars. Fireflies flicker amongst the trees, and lie with blue lambent light on the rocks. Not a word is spoken, every brain being intent on catching the glimmer of the white cap in front of him. . . . . We halt in profound darkness, and a series of matches is lit to examine the written directions of the route. The little flame gleams on sabre and cap for a few seconds, dances on the flickering waters, and leaves the darkness more profound than before. The sides of the ravine close in overhead, huge rocks hang over the stream, and gaunt leafless trees stretch out ragged branches like gibbets from the sky." The Bulgarian guide, however, despite all apprehension, proved good and true, and shortly after this the bivouac of the infantry which had gone before as an advanced guard was reached.

WITH THE TURKS

THESE six sketches were taken by our artist with the forces of Mehemet Ali Pasha, the Turkish Commander-in-Chief. The death of Aziz Pasha took place at the end of last month during a skirmish near Husenidje. The General, with Faszoulah Pasha and four battalions, had been ordered to protect by flank marching the division of Fuad Pasha, who was coming from the direction of Rustchuk. When near Husendje messengers brought intelligence that Fuad Pasha had achieved the most difficult part of his march, and no longer needed aid. As, however, Aziz Pasha heard that large bodies of troops had been seen near Husendje, he determined to make a reconnoissance, and accordingly marched at once in the direction of the enemy, who were soon espied upon some heights. A forest being close by, scouts were sent to reconnoitre, and were received by a sharp musketry fire. Thereupon Aziz Pasha ordered two battalions to advance, and take the wood by storm. He followed the troops with his staff on foot, and when within range of the enemy the latter opened a tremendous fire, and Aziz Pasha fell, struck by a bullet. His colleague succeeded in driving the Russians out of the wood, but the little victory was dearly purchased with the loss of one of the best generals in the Turkish army. "Aziz Pasha," writes our artist, "was an educated, intelligent, amiable and brave man, and his is a true loss to his country, and, indeed, to us correspondents, to whom he had always shown especial kindness and courtesy." He was a brother of Hafiz Pasha, who commanded the artillery during the Servian War, and was just about to be raised to the rank of Marshal.

The three Russian prisoners depicted were taken during the above skirmish, and transported to the camp at Rasgrad. Their names, counting from the left, are Nicolo Vassilovich, Vladimir Saneski, and Sacha Alexadrie. The three British officers in the service of the Turkish army are Colonel Borthwick (Mahir Bey), Captain Prime (Moad Effendi), and the Hon. Captain Drummond (Tahir Effendi). These gentlemen are all on the staff, and belong to the Turkish regular army on the Danube. The last-named officer is a nephew of Admiral Drummond of the British Navy. The "Red Crescent" is the Turkish branch of the Red Cross Society. As the Turks pointed out at the beginning of the war, a Mohammedan army could hardly work under a Christian symbol, so by a special agreement with the Geneva Convention they were allowed to substitute a "crescent" for the "cross" on their hospital flag. The sketch represents a doctor, his assistant, and the chair and stretchers used on the field. "Sharpening a Sword Bayonet" needs no description, neither does "Coffee in Camp," which represents some soldiers concocting what our artist terms, one of the "little extras of the army," namely, the cup of coffee so dear to an Ottoman, and which is not included in the regular rations of the troops.

WITH THE RUSSIANS—THE CZAR'S TEA KITCHEN

As the "little extra" above mentioned is to the Turk, so is tea to the Russian, and our sketch depicts the Royal tea kitchen at Biela, the Czar's headquarters, especially adopted for the preparation of that indispensable Muscovite beverage, which with a slice of lemon, and perhaps the slightest possible dash of rum, is one of the most refreshing tonics imaginable to a wearied traveller.

CORRESPONDENTS AND THE WAR

A SPECIAL article referring to these gentlemen will be found on page 178, but we may mention that our sketch of the official reception of the correspondents shows in what estimation they were held by the authorities. The illustration depicts a regular levée of all the correspondents attached to the Turkish headquarters, held at Shumla by Mehemet Ali Pasha, the Ottoman Commander-in-Chief. Some of these gentlemen are depicted in the special portraits, but we subjoin a list of those present, beginning at the reader's right hand:—Herr Sanger (Cologne Gazette), Herr Mayers (Neue Frei Presse), Herr Winter (Vienna Tagblatt), M. Bukovics (Frankfürter Zeitung), M. Camille Barrère (République Française and Manchester Guardian), Mr. Jourdan (Daily Telegraph), M. Jacquot (Journal des Débats), M. J. Suter (Daily Telegraph), Mr. Dymond (Morning Advertiser), Herr Lukotch (Hungarian Gazette), Mr. Melton Prior (Artist of the Illustrated News), Mr. Hanly (Stamboul), Mr. Fitzgerald (Stamboul). Sitting on the left of Mehemet Ali Pasha, on the divan, is Namyk Pasha.—Our engravings are from photographs by Messrs. Elliot and Fry, 55, Baker Street, A. D. Reiser, of Bucharest, F. Duschek, of Bucharest, and George Friedrich Monck, of Vienna.

WITH THE TURKS IN ASIA—EVACUATION OF THE GEORGIAN COAST

WHEN the war broke out, the Turks, inspired by a sudden fit of energy, determined upon an invasion of Russian Trans-Caucasia, and if possible to rekindle the fires of revolution which have never yet been completely extinguished amongst the unruly mountaineers of Circassia, Georgia, and Abkhasia. The success of the expedition was complete. Soukhoum Kaleh was taken, and troops and 5,000 Circassians were disembarked to aid the mountaineers, who showed every disposition to rise; while on the Georgian coast a large force was landed at Tchomchim. Owing, however, to the energetic steps adopted by the Russians, the revolution was suppressed, and, withdrawing their troops from Armenia, the latter eventually began to press rather closely upon the Turkish troops. An attack on Soukhoum, however, owing to the aid of the Turkish fleet, was repulsed, the Russians losing 4,000 men; but the Russians, being shortly reinforced, set to work to invest Tchomchira, which after some time the Turks determined to abandon, particularly as in a few weeks the anchorage would no longer be safe for the fleet. Thus, on the 30th ult., Hobart Pasha proceeded with five vessels—his flagship, the Mahmoudieh, the Avni Illah, the Shapher, the Arsari-Tefyk, and the Arsari-Shefket—from Soukhoum to Tchamchira to re-embark the troops from the Georgian coast. To keep the Russians investing the place from interfering, the Arsari-Shefket was stationed opposite their camp so as to pour upon them masses of grape-shot and shell, should any signs of action appear. The Russians, however, kept perfectly quiet, and with the aid of every boat in the fleet working day and night the whole of the troops were brought on board in safety, and the little fleet set sail for Soukhoum Kaleh. "Hobart Pasha," writes the correspondent of The Times, "was indefatigable in his exertions, passing about from place to place, stirring up the lazy and encouraging the diligent, and to his foresight and care in a great measure it is due that the affair was successfully carried out."

WITH THE TURKS—THE BATTLE OF PLEVNA

LAST week we gave a full account of this battle, together with sketches of the action from our artist with the Russians; and here we have a sketch from the Turkish side—an attack on one of the entrenchments on the east of Plevna by the Russians—which only the more completely demonstrates their suicidal folly of charging en masse with the bayonet strongly fortified positions armed with the best breech-loading artillery of modern times. Our artist writes:—"The effect produced by the bayonet charge, when seen from a distance, was that of a long undulating ribbon, with sparkling flashes caused by the light gleaming on the steel, the whole enveloped in a great cloud of dust. The attack was most furious, the Russians, continually emerging in column, left behind them on each retreat large heaps of slain, the Turkish guns naturally doing immense execution upon such dense masses of men; but nevertheless the Russians at one time succeeded in nearing the entrenchments, when they were repulsed at the point of the bayonet. At other points the fighting, though severe, was less furious. Adil Pasha had his sabre broken by a ball."

NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS AND THE WAR

a novel and most delightful attraction. The main object was, of course, the zig-zag roadway cut out of the cliff, but with this was incorporated a scheme for its embellishment which has been most successfully carried out. The erewhile dreary-looking cliff has been transformed into a charming garden, and along the perpendicular rock excavations have been made and fitted up in the quaint Old English style of architecture with shops, restaurants, &c., and there are a number of cleverly-contrived subways and flights of steps, which serve as short cuts from one part of the cliff to another. At the "elbow" of the winding roadway stands the "Etablissement," which is to be devoted to musical and other attractive entertainments. This building is in the same style as the shops, and is constructed of red brick with white stone carvings. The entrance has a noble façade, above which is a large circular window containing the Granville arms; and windows of stained glass, with allegorical symbols of Music and the sister arts. The hall is fifty feet wide and more than 100 feet in length. It is tastefully decorated in colour and gold, and lighted by an ornamental skylight and side windows of tinted glass, and the recesses around the walls are arranged as an aquarium and winter garden. Some idea of the enormous difficulties which had to be surmounted, and were actually overcome in the short space of three months, may be gathered from the following facts and figures. In penetrating to a depth of twenty-five to thirty feet, and excavating the chalk in which the buildings were to be erected, it was found necessary to support the archways by powerful spans of solid masonry and brickwork, for during the operations, in consequence of the friable nature of the material, the superincumbent chalk repeatedly fell in, crumbling down in huge masses; and thus the enormous quantity of 80,000 tons had to be removed. The materials used in the work included 2,500,000 bricks, 15,000 cubic feet of timber, 50,000 superficial feet of boarding, 1,000 cubic feet of stone; 1,200 loads of sand, 300 of flints, 200 of gravel, 450 tons of cement, 300 of lime, and four of nails, 130,000 tiles, 8,000 superficial feet of glass, 78 tons of ironwork, and more than 7,000 feet of iron piping. It only remains for us to say that the Granville Marina was opened on the 5th of July by the Lord Mayor of London, and to recommend any who may be yet lingering in London, undecided as to which way to turn their footsteps, to pay a visit to Ramsgate, if only to see for themselves how greatly the beauty of the place has been enhanced by the construction of the Granville Marina.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT COWES

During the regatta week, His Royal Highness amused himself in various ways, sometimes yachting, and at others visiting the ironclads and other vessels lying in the roads. On the Saturday, he went on board the Thunderer, and stayed while some torpedo practice was gone through. Each torpedo was charged with 100 lbs. of gunpowder, and the explosions were so severe that the shocks were felt by nearly every vessel in the roadstead. Our second sketch represents the finish of the Yacht Race for the Queen's Cup (value 100 guineas), open to all vessels belonging to the Royal Yacht Squadron. There were eight entries, and after a smart contest the Prince of Wales's schooner yacht Hildegarde proved the victor, the Vol-au-Vent and Ayacanora coming in second and third. As the winning yacht passed the Lord Warden, the Victoria and Albert, and the Osborne, she was loudly cheered by the blue-jackets on board those vessels, who had been critically watching the management of the competing craft.—Our engravings are from sketches kindly sent to us by Lieutenant W. P. Haynes, of H.M.S. Osborne.

THE TROOPS AT MALTA

The troopships Euphrates and Crocodile arrived at Malta on the 5th and 6th inst. respectively, and by the reinforcements they brought the garrison of the island has now been raised from five to about eight thousand men. "The troops," writes our artist, "were engaged all Sunday and Monday in disembarking and steaming to their various destinations about Malta. To make room for them the artillery had to suffer some inconvenience, and had to turn out of the various quarters and forts they occupied, and go into others smaller and more detached, since the quarters and barracks are not sufficient for the sudden influx of so large a force. The new arrivals appeared in very good health and spirits, and Malta presented a most lively and brilliant appearance on the occasion, the harbour being filled with hundreds of bright-coloured gondola-like boats, while flags were flying everywhere, for it happened also to be a Saint's day. The two troopships lay like huge leviathans across the grand harbour, the newly arrived troops steamed off in huge barges drawn by tugs and launches to their various headquarters.—Our illustration is from a sketch by Major P. H. Harcourt, R.A.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——The Home Rulers have stood well to the front during the past week. On Saturday there was a large gathering at Glasgow. A procession with bands and banners marched from the Green to the village of Cathcart. Amongst the speeches delivered was one by Mr. O'Donnell, M.P., who said that the assembly was such as might have gathered round O'Connell on the Hill of Tara. Mr. O'Donnell also spoke at another meeting held in the City Hall, Glasgow. He declared that so long as the Irish nation was denied the right of doing its own business, so long would Irish members have a shy at British legislation. "If Scotland was content to be the house-dog of Great Britain, the wolfdogs of Ireland would not barter their freedom for all the pock-puddings that could come from the Sassenach."—Messrs. Parnell and Biggar had an enthusiastic reception at the Dublin Rotunda on Tuesday. Great care was taken that none but friends should be admitted, strong barricades being erected on the platform, and the doorways and passages being guarded by a "committee" of young men armed with formidable shillelaghs which they were no wise loth to use. A resolution expressing approval of the obstructive policy in Parliament was moved by the editor of the Nation, and carried amid acclamation, and a vote of thanks was accorded to those Irish representatives who, "in honourable contrast to the tame and spiritless conduct of the mass of the Home Rule members, had supported Messrs. Biggar and Parnell."—On Friday last Mr. Butt, M.P., received a deputation of London Irishmen at his residence. He told them that he would neither lead, nor have anything to do with, the obstructive policy. He explained that he had been prevented by illness from doing many things during the past Session which he should otherwise have attempted, but the Whig party were gradually learning that they could not hope to get into power again without their assistance; and therefore those who were trying to break up the Home Rule party would have a great responsibility to answer for.—The Westminster Home Rule Union after much discussion has passed a resolution to the effect that it "does not feel called upon to express any opinion on the merits of the controversy at present unfortunately agitating the Home Rule party in Parliament."—Messrs. Parnell, Biggar, and O'Connor Power have it seems been "interviewed" by a correspondent of the New York Herald, whose letter, dated July 20, is copied into the Morning Advertiser. Mr. Parnell is reported to have said that if two men could do so much, twenty would be able to make "all business absolutely impossible," and then Parliament would be compelled to yield and offer a compromise. Mr. Biggar, it seems, thinks the present House of Commons "a thorough and admitted sham." The interviewer thinks that Messrs. Biggar and Parnell are certain to be well supported at the next general election, and remarks that with a body of twenty or thirty determined obstructives the English Parliament will indeed present a spectacle to make angels weep.—Mr. Gladstone has been entertaining more visitors at Hawarden. On Saturday some 4,000 excursionists from Salford and Over Darwen were admitted to the grounds, and the ex-Premier made a speech in which he touched on the Eastern Question, saying that it was needful to keep a vigilant watch on the Government lest they should yet betray the country into war on behalf of the most abominable Government in Europe. On Monday he had an audience of some 2,000 from different parts of Lancashire, and these were treated to a long harangue on a medley of subjects from the County Franchise to the beauties of Windermere, and from British interests in the East to the qualities of a good walking-stick.—Somebody has been writing to Mr. Gladstone begging him to let his voice be heard on the atrocities charged to the Russians as he had formerly done with respect to those alleged against the Turks. His reply is that we should first ascertain whether the events have really occurred, and, secondly, who were the doers. "The shameless, wholesale lying of the Turkish Government deprives its allegations of all claim to value. There is, however, I think, evidence enough of many cruel and horrible deeds. I myself should be most thankful to any one who would give me the means of judging whether they were due to Russians or to Bulgarians."

The British Association at Plymouth.——On Thursday last week some exceedingly interesting papers were read in the Geological Section, and in the Economical Section a discussion took place on the question of over-population. On Friday Mr. Francis Galton's address in the Anthropological department excited much interest; as did also Sir William Thompson's statement in the Physical Science Section in support of his old theory of the possibility of life having been originally brought to this earth by a stray meteoric stone. Saturday was spent in excursions, some of the members going down to the Hamoaze to witness gunnery and torpedo practice, others travelling to Dartmoor and Lee Moor, and a third party visiting Exeter, where after inspecting the Cathedral, they lunched with the Mayor and heard speeches from the Bishop Temple and Sir Stafford Northcote, the former dwelling on the need of intercommunication between the clergy and men of science, and the latter praising the Association as a practical as well as a theoretical institution. On Monday work was again resumed, Mr. Bramwell propounding a scheme for supplying London with water by means of artesian wells sunk into the chalk, Commander Cameron and Dr. Mango discoursing on Central Africa in the Geographical Section, and Professor Gladstone reading a paper to the Chemical Section. On Tuesday the session of Mechanical Section was surprised by the announcement that the authorities of the Trinity House had resolved to demolish the Eddystone Lighthouse and to build a new one upon a more secure part of the reef. The Telephone was exhibited by its inventor, Professor Bell, who gave a history of its "evolution." The illustrations of its power included speaking, singing, and organ playing, which were audible from a building a quarter of a mile distant. The honour of the discovery in England was, however, claimed by Mr. F. H. Varley, on behalf of his brother, Mr. Cromwell Varley. The meetings were brought to a close on Wednesday, when only two sections were opened. In the Mechanical the chief thing was a paper by Mr. Loftus Perkins, descriptive of an inexplodable boiler which he had invented; whilst in Economic Science Mr. Lawson Tait dealt with the question of hospital mortality, contending that the death-rate diminished with the size of the building. At the concluding meeting it was announced that grants to the amount of 1,081*l.* were made for original scientific researches. Next year the meeting will be held in Dublin, under the supervision of Mr. William Spottiswoode, the President-elect.

The Indian Famine.——Her Majesty the Queen and H.R.H. the Prince of Wales have each sent contributions of 500*l.* to the Lord Mayor of London for the Indian Famine Fund, which on Wednesday amounted to over 24,000*l.* The Princess of Wales has contributed 100*l.*, and Lord Derby 200*l.* At a meeting held at Manchester on Tuesday a resolution was passed declaring it to be the duty of the Government to organise, at the cost, if necessary, of the National Exchequer, adequate measures of relief.

Miscellaneous.——The Welsh Eistedfodd at Carnarvon commenced on Tuesday with a Bardic meeting in the Castle, the chief feature in the programme being a choral competition for a prize of 100 guineas, which was won by the Carnarvon Choral Union. Other prizes were given for vocal, instrumental, and literary ability.—A whole box full of Colorado beetles, some alive and some dead, have come to hand at Glasgow, having been sent thither per post from America. The lid of the box was perforated, and it is supposed that the specimens discovered last week on the railway between Plymouth and Bristol escaped from this very box.—Heavy storms and most destructive floods are reported from Scotland and the north of England. The crops have suffered immense damage, and whole droves of cattle and sheep have been carried away by the swollen rivers. Railway communications have been seriously interrupted. The herring fishery has been much hindered in consequence of the rough weather, and a number of boats are missing. Several fatalities are recorded at Fraserburgh, two persons were washed off the pier and killed. At Auchmity in Fifeshire a woman died from excitement caused by the flood, and on the Leven a little girl was carried away and drowned in the presence of hundreds of people, who could give no aid.—On Saturday a waterspout broke over Wrockwardine Wood, near Salop.

THEATRES

Some curious philosopher has discovered that, though the turmoil and the traffic of London streets never entirely cease, there is a moment—somewhere, we believe, between two and half-past two A.M.—when the mingled sounds which make up the roar of our great thoroughfares subside into so soft a murmur that the unpractised ear might at only a short distance mistake it for perfect silence. In like manner there is a time in the theatrical year when managerial enterprise in London is so nearly at a stand-still that the country visitor is under the impression that there is at our playhouses nothing to be seen. Of course, this is an exaggerated view of the case; for as there is always a certain number of persons remaining in town who will go to the theatre no matter what the state of the weather, so there are always managers who have a sufficient eye to business to provide for their wants. The problem in the summer months is simply how to secure an exceptional share of this patronage, which, though probably not enough to fill one-third of our theatres, is still very important, to close doors absolutely being, even to the manager who takes his ordinary troupe into the country, an unpleasant alternative, since rent and many salaries must be paid all the year round. As a rule it may be said that every manager keeps open as long as he can. In other words every manager—if we except Mrs. Bancroft and her company at the Prince of Wales's, who ordinarily take a holiday in the autumn—hopes to be the fortunate one whose programme will draw audiences when the thermometer ranges high; generally, indeed, nothing but actual experiment will convince him that he is not in that happy category. So it is that by degrees the area of competition is restricted until we come to that point when theatrical enterprise—though at its lowest point—is still alive, and here and there even flourishing.

We are now from the theatrical managers' point of view precisely at that deadest of weeks in the dead season when, at least on the Western side of Temple Bar, the greater number of our theatres are given over to dust and silence. One by one they have dropped away. Even the Gaiety, which has long enjoyed the proud distinction of being always open, has been known to close in August. It is related of Mr. Hollingshead that, being discovered one sultry summer evening standing on the steps of that popular establishment in an attitude expressive of leisurely though vigilant expectation, it was observed by a friend that he might be compared to "some fierce creature waiting for his prey;" to which Mr. Hollingshead replied that that might be, "but unfortunately there was no prey." This was, however, in the early days before that reputation had been won which secures both to the Gaiety evening entertainments and the Gaiety Saturday matinées a never-failing supply of patronage. At this moment the Gaiety, where The Bohemian Gy'url and the comedy of Weak Woman, in which Miss Farren, Mr. Terry, Miss Vaughan, and Mr. Royce afford so much amusement, are performing, is perhaps the only theatre which really fills. Even the Strand, which is a most popular house—and it may be added so small a house that half an ordinary audience will fill it—is shut for a short time. Besides these we have among the closed the Folly (late the Charing Cross), the Court Theatre, Drury Lane, the Duke's Theatre (late the Holborn), the Lyceum, the Olympic, the Opera Comique, the Prince of Wales's, the Princess's, the Queen's, the Royalty, and some houses less important. On the other hand, the Vaudeville is still able to attract with Our Boys, although now getting on for its thousandth representation, and notwithstanding the fact that Messrs. James and Thorne have resigned their parts to other hands in order to enjoy a short and well-earned holiday. There is also the Criterion, at which house Pink Dominos retains some of its popularity. The Globe is also open with Mr. Paul Meritt's Stolen Kisses and Mr. Reece's burlesque of The Lyons Mail—neither, it must be confessed, a very strong piece. At the Adelphi the pretty pantomime performed by children may be regarded as atoning in some degree for the lack of interest in the new melodrama entitled The Golden Plough. The Haymarket is under what is known as a summer management, but little that is favourable can be said for the American comedy of Brass, in which the author, Mr. Rowe, is nevertheless appearing nightly. At the Aquarium Theatre Miss Virginia Blackwood and her company from Camden Town are performing Little Nelly. These are the principal houses open—some we fear with but slight encouragement. But we must not forget the Alhambra, where a ballet entitled Yolande was produced on Saturday evening, which is remarkable for prettiness of music and bright and novel effects in the way of costumes and other accessories prepared under the direction of Mr. Alfred Thompson.

Meanwhile notes of preparation for the autumn season are many and important. Mr. Wilkie Collins has converted his singular romance, "The Moonstone," into a play, with some alterations in the story. It will be brought out about the middle of the present month at the Olympic, with Mr. Henry Neville in a leading character.—Drury Lane will reopen on the 22nd of September with Mr. W. G. Wills's "grand historical and spectacular dramatic romance in four acts," entitled England in the Days of Charles the Second. Mr. Wills has followed the example of the late Mr. Halliday in taking one of Sir Walter Scott's novels for his subject, this being a dramatisation of "Peveril of the Peak."—The Lyceum will reopen for a short season on Wednesday next, not, however, with Mr. Irving's name in the bill, but Miss Bateman (Mrs. Crowe) will then reappear in the new drama founded on Mr. Wilkie Collins' early novel, The Dead Secret. Miss Bateman will sustain the character of Sarah Leeson. The adaptation, though not made by Mr. Collins, has the sanction of that gentleman. Mrs. Bateman deserves at least credit for having set a good example to the less scrupulous, who, taking advantage of the unjustly defective state of the law, are apt to deal with the novelist's labours in a less ceremonious fashion.—After a fortnight's recess the Princess's is to reopen on the 10th of September, cleaned and handsomely redecorated—not, it may be observed, before these improvements in the aspect of the auditorium were needed. The new manager is Mr. Walter Gooch, for whom Mr. Byron has written a new play described as "of melodramatic interest," in four acts. Its title is Guinea Gold; or, Lights and Shadows of London Life. There is, perhaps, no dramatic venture more promising than the production of melodrama, provided that the piece be skilfully written, and not wanting in pathetic interest of a domestic kind. The Adelphi used to enjoy a reputation for dramas of this description, but its melodramatic renown is now at a somewhat low ebb. If Mr. Gooch can entertain the public in this way prosperity is pretty certain, for it cannot be said that we have at present any theatre in which this popular branch of the dramatist's art is cultivated with due care.

New Music

W. CZERNY.——Most of our youthful readers are well acquainted with "Czerny's 101 Studies for the Pianoforte" (first series), and, although they may have acquired this knowledge with many tears and through much tribulation, their task being accomplished they will welcome the second series as valuable aids to the study of the pianoforte for advanced pupils. The explanation of the various titles given by ancient composers to quaint old dances, for example, "The Pavane," "The Chaconne," "The Parsecaille," "The Sarabande," and others, will be found most useful to adult as well as youthful students, many of whom play these ancient compositions, and their modern imitations, without giving a thought to the origin of their names.—A dreamy, graceful, pianoforte piece is "Berceuse," by H. Ketten, one which should be learnt by heart and not forgotten.

MESSRS. STANLEY LUCAS, WEBER, AND CO.——Excellent holiday work will be found for instrumental students in a trio (A major) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by W. M. Balfe. The study of concerted music in the home circle is daily becoming more general, and is highly to be commended as a pleasant means whereby to pass away the long winter evenings.—A dramatic narrative of no inconsiderable merit is "Der Reiter und der Bodensee" (The Horseman and the Bodensee), a poem, by G. Schwab, which has been cleverly set to music by Algernon Acton for a baritone singer; although somewhat lengthy the interest is well kept up.

MESSRS. ASHDOWNE AND PARRY.——From hence come three fairly good baritone songs; music by Frank Moir. For "The Archer of Old" and "Ah Me!" the composer has supplied the words, whilst the very illegal but spirited poetry of "A Forest Life for Me" is by F. R. Goodyear.

MESSRS. NACHTHEIM AND COLMAN, BRUSSELS.——Three songs from a clever but evidently inexperienced hand give promise of future excellence on the part of the youthful composer, Jessica M. O'Brien. The tender words of "Adieu!" are by Alfred de Musset; the poetry of "La Veillée du Nègre," by Madame de Valmore; and that of "La Feuille Flétrie" by the musical composer herself.

MESSRS. C. E. GLOVER AND CO.——Of two tenor songs by H. A. Selwey, "Sleep on and Dream of Heaven," words by R. E. S., is preferable to the tame setting of Byron's "Maid of Athens."

MESSRS. J. R. LAFLEUR AND SONS.——Nos. 4, 5, 6, of "Original Recreations for the Violin, with Pianoforte Accompaniments," arranged by J. Halberstadt, are "Lamentation," "Grande Marche Pompeuse," and a "Tempo di Minuetto," all three of which are excellent in their way.

MISCELLANEOUS.——"A Nutshell Novel" is the title of a song composed by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew, words from "The Boudoir Ballads," by J. Ashby Sterry (Samuel Brewer).—There are times and seasons when a serio-comic song is welcome as a change from classical and scientific compositions; on such occasions "Biddy Malone," an Irish ballad, written and composed by W. C. Russell, will give general satisfaction (Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co.).—A pleasing ballad of medium compass is "The Roses Weep," written and composed by E. C. Essex (Messrs. Hodge and Essex).—Without doubt W. A. B. Lunn has spent much time and labour upon his hobby, "The Sequential System of Musical Notation," both before and since the first appearance of his treatise thereon in 1853, but after a very close examination of and with all deference to his theory, we cannot as yet discover any really good practical result which will follow its adoption (E. W. Allen).

SPORTING

THE TURF.——York is always an important Turf fixture, both in itself and from the fact that at it something of importance in reference to the great race at Doncaster next month generally transpires. Hence not a few of the leading patrons of the sport leave their shooting boxes, their yachts, or their sea-side quarters, and betake themselves for a few days to the old Royal city during the third week in August. The weather for the greater part of the meeting was by no means propitious to the proceedings on the Knavesmire, the rain at intervals coming down in torrents. The racing, though perhaps not quite up to the standard of some previous anniversaries, was certainly good, though by no means in favour of backers. For instance, in the first race of importance, the Yorkshire Oaks, both Muscatel, the favourite, and Helena, next in demand to her, succumbed to Lord Falmouth's Lady Golightly. This beautiful filly did not impress judges very favourably at Goodwood, but she is evidently fast improving, and not unlikely before long to recover her two-year-old form, which was about the best of the year. Last week she was completely knocked out of the St. Leger market, but was backed at 25 to 1 after her win in the Yorkshire Oaks. It is not improbable she will see a much shorter price; and it is "on the cards" that, like Mr. Merry a few years ago with Doncaster and Marie Stewart, Lord Falmouth may gain the first and second places with Silvio and Lady Golightly. His lordship was in a winning vein on the Tuesday, for he also took the Lonsdale Plate with Kitty Sprightly, and divided the Convivial Stakes with Redwing, Mr. Cartwright's "dark" filly Fair Lyonese being the other dead-heater. The Biennial was won by Strathmore, as might have been expected, while the Prince of Orange, owned by that Turf veteran Mr. Bowes, whose marriage a few days ago created quite a sensation among Turfites, had to yield to Queen Mary in the Produce Stakes. The Duke of Westminster, on whose Turf ventures fortune does not seem to smile as yet, made a score with Strathfleet in the Filly Sapling Stakes; Sunray took the Ebor St. Leger for Mr. Houldsworth, the first favourite, Sugar Loaf, failing to get a place; and Victoire, with 2 to 1 on him, secured the Londesborough Cup. The chief handicap of the meeting, the Great Ebor, only produced ten starters, many owners doubtless being frightened by the formidable appearance of Hampton, who seemed handicapped rather on the Goodwood Stakes defeat than his subsequent Cup victory. Of course Hampton started first favourite, but not nearly so hot a one as was expected, his starting price being about 9 to 4, whereas previously he had been backed at evens. He had little to do with the race itself, being pulled up when it was seen he had no chance. The issue rested with Il Gladiatore and Mrs. Pond, representing North and South, and the former won, after a most exciting finish, by a neck. But perhaps too much reliance must not be placed on the return, as the saddling was performed and the race run in a terrific downpour of rain, which reminded many of Blair Athol's Leger day. The form of many horses is modified under such circumstances.

CRICKET.——There are several interesting items of inter-county cricket. At the Oval on Saturday the game between Kent and Surrey (return) unfortunately had to be drawn when matters looked pretty even, Surrey having got 105 out of 222 runs required to win, with the loss of only four wickets. Kent scored 317 in her first innings, of which Mr. F. Penn, who has been in splendid batting form lately, made 148 (not out). Surrey responded with 264, of which Mr. Shuter was credited with 88 and Jupp with 91 (not out). This innings was a very remarkable one, as Jupp went in first on the Thursday, and was six hours at the wickets. A more cautious, almost obstinate, innings was perhaps never seen. The Surrey Club rewarded him with a present of 3*l.*—Gloucestershire had no great difficulty in beating Yorkshire in the return match at Clifton, winning by nine wickets. Midwinter, the Australian cricketer, played for Gloucestershire (his native county, we believe), and scored 68 in his first innings. In the second innings of Gloucestershire, Dr. E. M. Grace and F. G. Grace "brought down the house" by scoring 53 and 43 respectively, and bringing their bats out.—Nottinghamshire seems falling from her high estate, having got considerably the worst of a drawn match with Middlesex at the Old Trent Bridge Ground. Middlesex made the particularly round total of 400; and curiously enough two of her batsmen, A. J. Webbe and the Hon. A. Lyttelton, made exactly 100 each. Those who hold that Mr. Webbe is really one of the best bats of the day must be pleased with his performance, for there is no gainsaying the fact that he has been one of the most unlucky of our first-class batsmen. Nottinghamshire could only make 192, and afterwards 198, with one wicket standing.—Sussex and Lancashire have played their return match at Brighton, the Northerners winning in a single innings with forty runs to spare. Unfortunately Mr. Cotterill did not play for Sussex.—A draw has averted defeat from Derbyshire in a match with Yorkshire, the latter scoring 278 in the first innings against 74 and 220 of the former.

AQUATICS.——After a long correspondence as to articles, a match between Boyd and Higgins for the Championship may now be taken as settled.

POLO.——This capital game flourishes in Ireland. On Tuesday two matches were played on the Nine Acres, Phœnix Park, Dublin; the 7th Hussars beating the Castlecomer Club, and the County Carlow Club the 7th Fusiliers.

SWIMMING.——The Channel has again been "done"—this time by "Professor" Cavill. He failed in his attempt last year, but on this occasion he managed himself with more judgment, and made better calculations as regards the tides. He started on Monday at a quarter to 4 p.m. from Cape Grisnez, and in about twelve hours completed his task, apparently without being very much distressed. The probability is we shall now have some "lady" determined to rival the deeds of Captain Webb and Cavill.

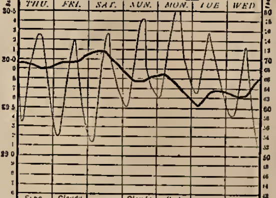
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

AUGUST 16TH TO AUGUST 22ND (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——Although the weather in London has been moderately fine on the whole during this period, it has been far otherwise in the more northern parts of the kingdom. The centres of several depressions have crossed our islands in a north-easterly direction, and while south-westerly winds, showery weather, and thunder have been experienced over our midland and southern counties, strong easterly and north-easterly winds have been felt in the north, accompanied by torrents of rain and very cold weather. London escaped in a very singular manner the storms and rain which were felt even in most of the southern parts of England; but on Tuesday night and Wednesday morning, the 21st and 22nd, very heavy showers fell, so that in all more than six tenths of an inch were collected by 8 a.m. on Wednesday, the 22nd, and a few hundredths more during the same day. Later in the day, however, the wind drew round to the northward of west, the sky cleared, and temperature fell fast. The barometer was highest (30·08 inches) on Saturday, the 18th instant; lowest (29·54 inches) on Tuesday, the 21st instant; range, 0·54 inch. Temperature, in the shade, was highest (81°) on Monday, the 20th instant; lowest (51°) on Wednesday, the 22nd instant; range, 30°. Rainfall: Total fall, 0·68 inch, all of which fell on Wednesday, the 22nd instant. There was a heavy local shower in the west of London early on Tuesday morning, the 21st instant, but it was not experienced in the south where our rain gauge is placed. Wednesday night last was very cold, the lowest temperature being 47°.

Scraps

PERSIA will enter the Postal Union from the 1st September.

THE PICTURE GALLERY OF VAN LOON AT AMSTERDAM has been purchased by Baron Rothschild of Paris for 100,000*l.*

EVEN BIG BEN IS TAKING A HOLIDAY just now, and the Westminster clock has been stopped for repair for three weeks.

A NOVEL PRESENT has been sent to the Pope by a lady of Philadelphia. It is a teapot from Honolulu, which keeps tea warm for twenty-four hours. Unfortunately, however, the Pope is said never to drink tea.

AN EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE is being held at Copenhagen, at which we notice, amongst other subjects, that there have been discussions upon the "Necessity of Teaching Children Kindness to Animals"—a "necessity" all but wholly neglected in the ordinary educational curriculum, and one of which we should be glad to see the importance acknowledged in England.

THE DEATH OF MISS MARY CARPENTER has been deeply mourned in India, and at a meeting of Bengali ladies at Calcutta a resolution was passed expressing their grief at the event, and their deep sense of gratitude for Miss Carpenter's indefatigable exertions on behalf of Indian women. In order to perpetuate her name and work a Committee was formed for the purpose of compiling and publishing her biography in the Bengali language.

AN ALL-IMPORTANT ASTRONOMICAL DISCOVERY has been made by Professor Henry, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, who has telegraphed to M. Leverrier of Paris that two satellites of the planet Mars—now so conspicuous an object in the evening sky—have been seen by Professor Asaph Hall of the Naval Observatory, Washington, doubtless with the grand refractor of that establishment. On August 18 at 11, elongation of the first satellite, west; distance 80 sec., period 30 hours; distance of second satellite 50 sec., which are all the particulars furnished in the telegram. The mass of this planet, hitherto determinable only from theory and liable to uncertainty, will now be more definitely ascertained.

NOTWITHSTANDING THE POLITICAL CRISIS and the attack on General Berthaut the Paris Figaro is so hard up for news as to insert various pointless paragraphs such as the following:—"In the express train from Geneva to Paris a Frenchman finds himself in a compartment with seven Englishmen. 'One question, gentlemen,' he remarks after some hours' travelling. 'As you appear always to be on the Continent is your country so very disagreeable?' The seven Englishmen answer without a frown, 'Very!' And you find it very wearisome?' pursued the interlocutor. 'Most so,' was the answer." Have French journalists lost all their old witty inventiveness, or is this to be taken as a sample of modern Gallic humour?

A ROMAN VILLA has been discovered at Preston, near Brighton. The remains of an old Roman house were brought to light during recent excavations for building purposes, and were found at a depth of between two and three feet from the surface. They consist principally of a quantity of mosaic pavement, several large portions of which have been preserved intact; many fragments of pottery, of good workmanship; and a number of bronze and copper coins not yet classified. A small vase of reddish colour was found unbroken. The site is within a mile or two of a well-known Roman fortified place (Hollingbury Camp), one of the circle of camps formed to guard the harbour of Portus Adurni, now known as Aldrington. Remains of a less extensive character, including cinerary urns, coins, &c., have previously been found in the district.
